PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE EIGHTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1803.

MONDAY, October 17, 1803.

The first session of the eighth Congress, conformably to the Constitution of the United States, commenced at the City of Washington, agreeably to the Proclamation of the President of the United States for that purpose; and the Senate assembled on this day.

PRESENT:

SIMEON OLCOTT and WILLIAM PLUMER, from New Hampshire;

TIMOTHY PICKERING, from Massachusetts;

JAMES HILLHOUSE and URIAH TRACY, from Connecticut;

CHRISTOPHER ELLERY and SAMUEL I. POTTER, from Rhode Island;

STEPHEN R. BRADLEY and ISRAEL SMITH, from Vermont;

DEWITT CLINTON and THEODORUS BAILEY, from New York;

JONATHAN DAYTON and JOHN CONDIT, from New Jersey;

GEORGE LOGAN and SAMUEL MACLAY, from Pennsylvania;

WILLIAM HILL WELLS and SAMUEL WHITE, from Delaware;

ROBERT WRIGHT and SAMUEL SMITH, from Maryland;

JOHN TAYLOR and WILSON CAREY NICHOLAS, from Virginia;

JOHN BROWN and JOHN BRECKENRIDGE, from Kentucky;

JESSE FRANKLIN and DAVID STONE, from North Carolina;

JOSEPH ANDERSON and WILLIAM COCKE, from Tennessee;

ABRAHAM BALDWIN, from Georgia; and

THOMAS WORTHINGTON, from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tem., as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being collected and counted, the whole number was found to be twenty-nine, of which fifteen make a majority. Mr. BROWN had 24, Mr. BALDWIN 2, Mr. DAYTON 2, and Mr. PICKERING 1.

Consequently, the honorable JOHN BROWN was elected President of the Senate pro tempore.

The credentials of the following Senators were severally read, to wit:

Of JOSEPH ANDERSON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee; of THEODORUS BAILEY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New York; of JAMES HILLHOUSE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut; of SAMUEL MACLAY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania; of SAMUEL I. POTTER, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island; of ISRAEL SMITH, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Vermont; of SAMUEL WHITE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware; for the term of six years from and after the third day of March last, respectively: also, of THOMAS WORTHINGTON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Ohio; of JOHN CONDIT, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of New Jersey; of JOHN TAYLOR, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Virginia, in place of S. T. Mason, deceased; of TIMOTHY PICKERING, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, in the place of Dwight Foster, resigned; and the oath required by law was, by the PRESIDENT, administered to them respectively.

The oath was also administered to SAMUEL SMITH, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, for the term of six years from and after the third day of March last.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and acquaint him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, they have elected the Hon. JOHN BROWN, President of the Senate pro tempore.

The Secretary was directed to give a similar notice to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That JAMES MATHERS, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one additional assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for that purpose during the session, and for twenty days after.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied during the present session with three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House had assembled, and had elected the Hon. NATHANIEL MAON their Speaker, and is ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That Messrs. CLINTON and BRECKENRIDGE be a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House agree to the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and have appointed a committee on their part.

On motion, Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

The Senate proceeded to the choice of a Chaplain on their part, and the ballots having been collected and counted, the whole number was twenty-eight; of which fifteen make a majority. Mr. GANTT had 15 votes, and Mr. M'CORMICK 13.

Consequently, the Rev. Dr. GANTT was elected.

Mr. CLINTON reported, from the joint committee appointed for the purpose, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that he had acquainted them that he would make a communication to the two Houses, by message, immediately.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

In calling you together, fellow-citizens, at an earlier day than was contemplated by the act of the last session of Congress, I have not been insensible to the personal inconveniences necessarily resulting from an unexpected change in your arrangements. But matters of great public concernment have rendered this call necessary, and the interest you feel in these will supersede, in your minds, all private considerations.

Congress witnessed, at their late session, the extraordinary agitation produced in the public mind by the suspension of our right of deposit at the port of New Orleans, no assignment of another place having been made according to treaty. They were sensible that the continuance of that privation would be more injurious to our nation than any consequences which could flow from any mode of redress; but, reposing just confidence in the good faith of the Government whose officer had committed the wrong, friendly and reasonable representations were resorted to, and the right of deposit was restored.

Previous, however, to this period, we had not been unaware of the danger to which our peace would be perpetually exposed whilst so important a key to the commerce of the western country remained under a foreign Power. Difficulties too were presenting themselves as to the navigation of other streams, which arising within our territories, pass through those adjacent. Propositions had therefore been authorized for obtaining, on fair conditions, the sovereignty of New Orleans, and of other possessions in that quarter, interesting to our quiet, to such extent as was deemed practicable; and the provisional appropriation of two millions of dollars, to be applied and accounted for by the President of the United States, intended as part of the price, was considered as conveying the sanction of Congress to the acquisition proposed. The enlightened Government of France saw, with just discernment, the importance to both nations of such liberal arrangements as might best and permanently promote the peace, interests, and friendship of both; and the property and sovereignty of all Louisiana, which had been restored to them, has, on certain conditions, been transferred to the United States, by instruments bearing date the 30th of April last. When these shall have received the Constitutional sanction of the Senate, they will, without delay, be communicated to the Representatives for the exercise of their functions, as to those conditions which are within the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress. Whilst the property and sovereignty of the Mississippi and its waters secure an independent outlet for the produce of the Western States, and an uncontrolled navigation through their whole course, free from collision with other Powers, and the dangers to our peace from that source, the fertility of the country, its climate and extent, promise, in due season, important aids to our Treasury, an ample provision for our posterity, and a wide spread for the blessings of freedom and equal laws.

With the wisdom of Congress it will rest to take those ulterior measures which may be necessary for the immediate occupation and temporary government of the country; for its incorporation into our Union; for rendering the change of government a blessing to our newly adopted brethren; for securing to them the rights of conscience and of property; for confirming to the Indian inhabitants their occupancy and self-government, establishing friendly and commercial relations with them, and for ascertaining the geography of the country acquired. Such materials for your information relative to its affairs in general, as the short space of time has permitted me to collect, will be laid before you when the subject shall be in a state for your consideration.

Another important acquisition of territory has also been made since the last session of Congress. The friendly tribe of Kaskaskia Indians, with which we have never had a difference, reduced by the wars and wants of savage life to a few individuals, unable to defend themselves against the neighboring tribes, has transferred its country to the United States, reserving only for its members what is sufficient to maintain them in an agricultural way. The considerations stipulated are, that we shall extend to them our patronage and protection, and give them certain annual aids, in money, in implements of agriculture, and other articles of their choice. This country, among the most fertile within our limits, extending along the Mississippi from the mouth of the Illinois to and up the Ohio, though not so necessary as a barrier since the acquisition of the other bank, may yet be well worthy of being laid open to immediate settlement, as its inhabitants may descend with rapidity in support of the lower country, should future circumstances expose that to foreign enterprise. As the stipulations in this treaty also involve matters within the competence of both Houses only, it will be laid before Congress as soon as the Senate shall have advised its ratification.

With many of the other Indian tribes improvements in agriculture and household manufacture are advancing; and, with all, our peace and friendship are established on grounds much firmer than heretofore. The measure adopted of establishing trading-houses among them, and of furnishing them necessaries in exchange for their commodities at such moderate prices as leave no gain, but cover us from loss, has the most conciliatory and useful effect on them, and is that which will best secure their peace and good will.

The small vessels authorized by Congress, with a view to the Mediterranean service, have been sent into that sea, and will be able more effectually to confine the Tripoline cruisers within their harbors, and supersede the necessity of convoy to our commerce in that quarter. They will sensibly lessen the expenses of that service the ensuing year.

A further knowledge of the ground in the northeastern and northwestern angles of the United States has evinced that the boundaries established by the treaty of Paris, between the British territories and ours in those parts, were too imperfectly described to be susceptible of execution. It has therefore been thought worthy of attention, for preserving and cherishing the harmony and useful intercourse subsisting between the two nations, to remove, by timely arrangements, what unfavorable incidents might otherwise render a ground of future misunderstanding. A convention has therefore been entered into, which provides for a practicable demarcation of those limits, to the satisfaction of both parties.

An account of the receipts and expenditures of the year ending 30th September last, with the estimates for the service of the ensuing year, will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, so soon as the receipts of the last quarter shall be returned from the more distant States. It is already ascertained that the amount paid into the Treasury for that year has been between eleven and twelve millions of dollars; and that the revenue accrued, during the same term, exceeds the sum counted on as sufficient for our current expenses, and to extinguish the public debt within the period heretofore proposed.

The amount of debt paid for the same year is about three million one hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of interest, and making, with the payment of the preceding year, a discharge of more than eight millions and a half of dollars of the principal of that debt, besides the accruing interest: and there remain in the Treasury nearly six millions of dollars. Of these, eight hundred and eighty thousand have been reserved for payment of the first instalment due under the British convention of January 8th, 1802, and two millions are what have been before mentioned as placed by Congress, under the power and accountability of the President, towards the price of New Orleans, and other territories acquired, which, remaining untouched, are still applicable to that object, and go in diminution of the sum to be funded for it.

Should the acquisition of Louisiana be Constitutionally confirmed and carried into effect, a sum of nearly thirteen millions of dollars will then be added to our public debt, most of which is payable after fifteen years; before which term, the present existing debts will all be discharged by the established operation of the Sinking Fund. When we contemplate the ordinary annual augmentation of impost from increasing population and wealth, the augmentation of the same revenue by its extension to the new acquisition, and the economies which may still be introduced into our public expenditures, I cannot but hope that Congress, in reviewing their resources, will find means to meet the intermediate interest of this additional debt, without recurring to new taxes; and applying to this object only the ordinary progression of our revenue, its extraordinary increase in times of foreign war will be the proper and sufficient fund for any measures of safety or precaution which that state of things may render necessary in our neutral position.

Remittances for the instalments of our foreign debt having been found practicable without loss, it has not been thought expedient to use the power, given by a former act of Congress, of continuing them by re-loans, and of redeeming, instead thereof, equal sums of domestic debt, although no difficulty was found in obtaining that accommodation.

The sum of fifty thousand dollars appropriated by Congress for providing gun boats remains unexpended. The favorable and peaceable turn of affairs on the Mississippi rendered an immediate execution of that law unnecessary; and time was desirable in order that the institution of that branch of our force might begin on models the most approved by experience. The same issue of events dispensed with a resort to the appropriation of a million and a half of dollars, contemplated for purposes which were effected by happier means.

We have seen with sincere concern the flames of war lighted up again in Europe, and nations, with which we have the most friendly and useful relations, engaged in mutual destruction. While we regret the miseries in which we see others involved, let us bow with gratitude to that kind Providence, which, inspiring with wisdom and moderation our late Legislative Councils, while placed under the urgency of the greatest wrongs, guarded us from hastily entering into the sanguinary contest, and left us only to look on and to pity its ravages. These will be the heaviest on those immediately engaged. Yet the nations pursuing peace will not be exempt from all evil. In the course of this conflict let it be our endeavor, as it is our interest and desire, to cultivate the friendship of the belligerent nations by every act of justice, and of innocent kindness; to receive their armed vessels with hospitality from the distresses of the sea, but to administer the means of annoyance to none; to establish in our harbors such a police as may maintain law and order; to restrain our citizens from embarking individually in a war in which their country takes no part; to punish severely those persons, citizen or alien, who shall usurp the cover of our flag for vessels not entitled to it, infecting thereby with suspicion those of real Americans, and committing us into controversies for the redress of wrongs not our own; to exact from every nation the observance, towards our vessels and citizens, of those principles and practices which all civilized people acknowledge; to merit the character of a just nation, and maintain that of an independent one, preferring every consequence to insult and habitual wrong. Congress will consider whether the existing laws enable us efficaciously to maintain this course with our citizens in all places, and with others while within the limits of our jurisdiction; and will give them the new modifications necessary for these objects. Some contraventions of right have already taken place, both within our jurisdictional limits, and on the high seas. The friendly disposition of the Governments from whose agents they have proceeded, as well as their wisdom and regard for justice, leave us in reasonable expectation that they will be rectified and prevented in future; and that no act will be countenanced by them which threatens to disturb our friendly intercourse. Separated by a wide ocean from the nations of Europe, and from the political interests which entangle them together, with productions and wants which render our commerce and friendship useful to them, and theirs to us, it cannot be the interest of any to assail us, nor ours to disturb them. We should be most unwise, indeed, were we to cast away the singular blessings of the position in which nature has placed us, the opportunity she has endowed us with, of pursuing, at a distance from foreign contentions, the paths of industry, peace, and happiness; of cultivating general friendship, and of bringing collisions of interest to the umpire of reason rather than of force. How desirable, then, must it be, in a Government like ours, to see its citizens adopt, individually, the views, the interests, and the conduct, which their country should pursue, divesting themselves of those passions and partialities which tend to lessen useful friendships, and to embarrass and embroil us, in the calamitous scenes of Europe! Confident, fellow-citizens, that you will duly estimate the importance of neutral dispositions towards the observance of neutral conduct, that you will be sensible how much it is our duty to look on the bloody arena spread before us, with commiseration, indeed, but with no other wish than to see it closed, I am persuaded you will cordially cherish these dispositions in all discussions among yourselves, and in all communications with your constituents; and I anticipate, with satisfaction, the measures of wisdom which the great interests now committed to you will give you an opportunity of providing, and myself, that of approving and of carrying into execution with the fidelity I owe to my country.

OCT. 17, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message was read, and five hundred copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

TUESDAY, October 18.

PIERCE BUTLER, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, for the unexpired time for which the late John Ewing Colhoun was elected to serve, produced his credentials, which were read, and the oath required by law was administered to him by the President.

JAMES JACKSON, from the State of Georgia, attended.

The credentials of SAMUEL SMITH, a Senator from the State of Maryland, were read.

WEDNESDAY, October 19.

The Senate spent the day in the consideration of Executive business.

THURSDAY, October 20.

The Senate assembled, and, after the consideration of Executive business, adjourned.

FRIDAY, October 21.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, for six years, commencing the 4th day of March last, produced his credentials, which were read; and the oath required by law was administered to him by the President.

Mr. WORTHINGTON presented the memorial of Joseph Harrison and others, citizens of the United States, residing in that part of the Indiana Territory which lies north of an east and west line extending through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, praying that that district may be erected into a separate government; and the memorial was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to MESSRS. WORTHINGTON, BRECKENRIDGE, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate, of the 17th instant, for the appointment of Chaplains, and have appointed the Rev. WILLIAM PARKINSON Chaplain to Congress on their part.

Mr. CLINTON, after a few prefatory observations on the necessity of designating the persons, severally, whom the people should wish to hold the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, and stating that the State which he represented, as well as others of the Union, had, through the medium of their Legislatures, strongly recommended the adoption of the principle, laid on the table the following motion, which he read; and it was made the order of the day for the next day, and printed.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

That the third paragraph of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, in the words following, to wit: "The Electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the said House shall, in like manner, choose a President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President; but, if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them by ballot the Vice President:—be expunged from the Constitution, and that the following paragraph be inserted in lieu thereof, to wit:

“The Electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in distinct ballots the person voted for as President, and the person voted for as Vice President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the — highest on the list, the said House shall, in like manner, choose the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote: a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President shall be Vice President; and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such an equal number; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.”

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE gave notice, that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for other purposes.

SATURDAY, October 22.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In my communication to you of the 17th instant, I informed you that conventions had been entered into with the Government of France for the cession of Louisana to the United States. These, with the advice and consent of the Senate, having now been ratified, and my ratification exchanged for that of the First Consul of France in due form, they are communicated to you for consideration in your Legislative capacity. You will observe that some important conditions cannot be carried into execution, but with the aid of the Legislature; and that time presses a decision on them without delay.

The ulterior provisions, also, suggested in the same communication, for the occupation and government of the country, will call for early attention. Such information relative to its government as time and distance have permitted me to obtain, will be ready to be laid before you in a few days. But, as permanent arrangements for this object may require time and deliberation, it is for your consideration whether you will not forthwith make such temporary provisions for the preservation, in the meanwhile, of order and tranquillity in the country, as the case may require.

Ocr. 21, 1803. TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message was read, and, together with the papers therein referred to, ordered to lie for consideration.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE had leave to bring in a bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for other purposes; which bill was read, and ordered to the second reading. The bill is in the following words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of and occupy the territories ceded by France to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris, on the 30th day of April last, between the two nations; and that he may for that purpose, and in order to maintain in the said territories the authority of the United States, employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the force authorized by an act passed the 3d day of March last, entitled “An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals,” which he may deem necessary: And so much of the sum appropriated by the said act as may be necessary is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying this act into effect; to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That until Congress shall have made provision for the temporary government of the said territories, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised by and in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct.

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, ANDERSON, and BALDWIN, be a committee for the revival of unfinished business, and that the committee be instructed to report what laws have expired by their own limitation, or will expire during the present session; and report thereon to the Senate.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, That the Senate now proceed to the election of a Secretary and other officers of the Senate,

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The order of the day being called for on Mr. CLINTON's motion of yesterday,

Mr. CLINTON said that, as the resolution was but now printed, and laid before the Senate, it might be proper to refer it to Monday for further consideration, but if it was requisite, by the rules of the Senate, that the resolution must have three separate readings, and on three different days, he should call for a second reading on Saturday, that it might be in readiness for a third reading on Monday, and be ultimately acted upon that day, as the Legislatures of Tennessee and Vermont were in session, and probably must be at the trouble of an extra session to act upon the amendment, unless it could be sent to them before they separated.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, the President pro tem. of the Senate, said the written rule of the Senate determined that bills should have three readings, and on different days, without unanimous consent to the contrary; but the resolutions were not included; and that he should be glad of the opinion of the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. TRACY of Connecticut said, that there was no written rule which would reach the case, but the Vice President, upon the ground that they came within the reason of the rule, had determined that all resolutions which required a joint vote of both Houses to give them efficacy, should take the same course as bills, and have three readings, and on different days, before a final vote; and as this resolution went to the alteration of the supreme law of the land, as the Constitution was declared to be, he thought it highly requisite to give the deliberations all the solemnity which was required in passing bills.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, then offered two amendments to the resolution; one went to the form only, and the other makes a majority of votes of the electors requisite for a choice of Vice President, and in case such majority is not obtained, places the choice of Vice President in the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, proposed an amendment by adding a new clause, in substance: "That at the next election of President, no person should be eligible who had served more than eight years, and, in all future elections, no person should be eligible more than four years in any period of eight years."

Mr. DAYTON, of New Jersey, moved to refer the resolution, with all the amendments, to a select committee; he said that it was a subject far too important to be carried in this way. There has been no time to consider it. Something more was due in this instance, than, as it were, offering it one moment, and deciding upon it the next.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, of Connecticut, supported the motion for referring the question to a select committee. He was opposed to entering now upon the business. Why should this subject be hurried? Why not have taken it up last session? we might in that case have had time to consider it. He had not often known a resolution, of the nature of that before the House, disposed of otherwise, in the first instance, than being referred to a committee. He never knew it refused. In a great and free empire, like the United States, this question is of the highest importance—no less than the choice of the First Magistrate. It is laid upon the table to-day, and we are to determine upon it to-morrow. He hoped not; and as he never knew it refused before, he hoped that it would not be adopted now. He wished it to be referred to a select committee; that it should there be examined, line by line, letter by letter. In the present mode of doing business, it is impossible to act with accuracy. He again trusted and hoped that it would be referred to a select committee.

Mr. JACKSON, of Georgia, wished the business to be immediately proceeded upon. He was an admirer of Mr. Jefferson; he was happy, and he trusted all were happy, while he was President. But, continued Mr. J., we know not who may follow him; we may have a Bonaparte, or one who will be equally obnoxious to the people. He hoped the motions would be incorporated and immediately come before the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, spoke for some time against the resolution going to a committee. He was against the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER. A committee might report when they pleased. He therefore thought it necessary to proceed with the question immediately.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, wished to have some principles fixed. If the motion and amendments were to go a committee, he would not tack them together, for by this mode they might both be lost. It has been said that the subject might have been entered into last session. There was then a multiplicity of business of importance before the House, yet this subject might have been entered into. As it stands, this is the proper place to make objections. The mover of the resolution does not say that it shall be determined on Monday; he means that it shall then be before the whole House.

Mr. BUTLER observed, in favor of its going to a committee, in order to prevent delay, he would require that they should report on Monday, for, on such an emergency, they might sit on Sunday. This might be adopted, provided it could be got to a committee. He did not think that the House should legislate upon adventitious or extraneous matter, because the Legislature of Vermont or Tennessee, or any other State, were sitting. We are not, for such reasons, to be hurried.

Mr. CLINTON said, he would consent to waive his motion, if the gentleman who moved last would consent that the whole should be entered into on Monday. We are charged, continued Mr. C., with hurrying on this business, but he was not to be intimidated from doing his duty. What was the use of a select committee? He hoped that the resolution and amendments might be printed, and made the order of the day for Monday.

Mr. BUTLER.—I penned my amendment since I came into the House. I believe the country is as ripe for it, as for the resolution, and the other amendments. I believe this business is hurried more than it ought to be. If the gentleman who first moved, will take up his motion, I think that he will be the first, on Monday, to condemn this hurry.

OCTOBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. HILLHOUSE again spoke in favor of a committee. He observed that, in case a President should die the day after his election, who then is to supply his place? A man chosen by the electors? No; a man named by the Senate. A man may thus be chosen contrary to the wish of the people. Once it was in contemplation to have no Vice President, but again it was thought that either would make a good President, and he did not see any great use in the office of Vice President. If we are to constitute a Vice President to execute the office of President in case of his death, which will be the case, and if the Senate can elect a President, in such case it may fall upon a man who had only two votes, and the man who had a greater number would be Vice President. We must not pass over, concluded Mr. H., a subject of such importance in this way.

After some desultory observations, in which one member observed that he thought it disorderly, the question on Mr. BUTLER'S amendment was put—ayes 16, nays 15.

A committee was then chosen for the purpose, namely:

Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. CLINTON, Mr. NICHOLAS, and Mr. SMITH.

MONDAY, October 24.

The bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for other purposes, was read the second time and referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, DAYTON, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BUTLER, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 22d inst., the motion for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made report, which was read.

Mr. DAYTON moved to strike out all which respected the appointment of a Vice President.

He said the great inducements of the framers of the Constitution to admit the office of Vice President was, that, by the mode of choice, the best and most respectable man should be designated; and that the Electors of each State should vote for one person at least, living in a different State from themselves; and if the substance of the amendment was adopted, he thought the office had better be abolished. Jealousies were natural between President and Vice President; no heir apparent ever loved the person on the throne. With this resolution for an amendment to the Constitution we were left with all the inconveniences, without a single advantage from the office of Vice President.

Mr. CLINTON.—The obvious intention of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey, is to put off or get rid of the main question. It would more comport with the candor of the gentleman to meet the question fairly. Can the gentleman suppose that the Electors will not vote for a man of respectability for Vice President? True, the qualifications are distinct, and ought not to be confounded; this will stave off the question till the Legislatures of the States of Tennessee and Vermont are out of session, and the object must be very obvious.

Mr. DAYTON.—The custom of the gentleman from New Jersey has been of late to arraign motives instead of meeting arguments; on Saturday he accused me of wishing to procrastinate, and now the same is repeated.

The reasons of erecting the office are frustrated by the amendment to the Constitution now proposed; it will be preferable, therefore, to abolish the office.

Mr. CLINTON.—The charge of the gentleman from New Jersey is totally unfounded that I arraign motives, and do not meet arguments. On Saturday, the gentleman accused me of precipitation; I am not in the habit of arraigning motives, as this Senate can witness, and the charge is totally untrue.

Mr. NICHOLAS.—To secure the United States from the dangers which existed during the last choice of President, the present resolution was introduced. It was impossible to act upon, or pass the amendment offered by the member from New Jersey, with a full view of all its bearings at this time. It ought not to stand in the way of the resolution reported by the committee, for two-thirds or three-quarters of the State Legislatures would be in session in two or three months; the Senate had, therefore, better not admit the amendment, even if convinced that it was correct, because it might jeopardize the main amendment of discriminating.

Mr. BUTLER moved a postponement until Wednesday, because the amendment was important, and he had not had sufficient time to make up his mind.

Mr. WORTHINGTON said the same.

This motion was seconded.

Mr. COCKE was opposed to the postponement, because he feared the State Legislatures would be out of session, so as not to carry the amendment into effect before the next choice of President.

Mr. WRIGHT was opposed to the postponement. The proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey was foreign to the first amendment. The people had not expressed an opinion upon it, pro nor con, but on the discriminating principle, they had. Whatever his opinion was, he would not vote for this amendment till he knew the voice of the people upon it. Shall we postpone, beyond this session, what we do understand, in order to take up what we do not understand? In a representative Government we ought to act as we think the people wish, and in pursuance to the public mind.

Mr. JACKSON did not know how he should vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, but was willing to indulge the gentleman who asked for a postponement. What were the ideas of gentlemen? Were the State Legislatures all about to die? If they were not in session when Congress had acted upon this amendment they could be called together. He remembered that the Vice President was called the fifth wheel to a coach, many years ago, and it might be well, now we are on the subject, to examine whether the office cannot be dispensed with. We have time enough.

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—So important was this subject, that he wished for more time; the gentleman from New York thinks the two offices are very diverse; (here he cited the Constitution, by which the duties of the President devolve on the Vice President in certain cases;) he thought it worthy of mature consideration, if the discriminating principle was introduced into the choice of Vice President, whether the office had not better be abolished.

Mr. TRACY inquired how long the Legislatures of Tennessee and Vermont had been in session; and how long they would probably continue; and supposed a day or two spent in deliberation would not cause much trouble or expense.

Mr. ANDERSON said the Legislature of Tennessee would probably sit till the tenth or fifteenth of November.

Mr. WORTHINGTON said he was opposed to the postponement, and should vote against the amendment, because he was not prepared to act upon it; not knowing what was the opinion of his constituents upon it.

Mr. S. SMITH mentioned that the last choice of President had prepared the people to require the discrimination; but the abolition of the office was new. If the choice of Vice President in the way proposed, should, upon experiment, prove to be improper, then it could be altered.

He was ready to act at once and vote against the amendment, and should not pay so poor a compliment to any gentleman's abilities, as to say he could not make up his mind at once. He was against postponing.

The question for postponement was taken, and lost—ayes 15, noes 16.

The amendment of Mr. DAYTON was now before the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS thought the discriminating principle was well understood; but the consequences had not been fully contemplated; one was, the abolition of the office of Vice President. Whether it was best to abolish or not, he would not say, but to consider it with the other subject was certainly correct, and he wished for longer time.

Mr. MACLAY could not see that any new principle was introduced by the committee; he thought that a suggestion that an improper person would be chosen Vice President was premature; it could not be known till tried.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE said his mind was made up to vote for nothing but the discriminating principle, so his constituents wished; and he would not go into consideration of any other amendments, but wished this to go into operation before the next election. His opinion was, that the duration of the office in the Senate, (six years,) was the most anti-republican he could conceive of, but if he moved that and connected it with the discriminating principle, he might lose all; he was against a postponement.

Mr. WHITE was convinced that the members were unprepared to act, and particularly so, by what fell from the member last up, and moved a postponement until to-morrow.

This motion was seconded by Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. CLINTON moved for the yeas and nays upon the question of postponement.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he should vote for the postponement; and as the yeas and nays were called, he would offer the reasons for his vote.

He had long been a member of the Senate, and had never known a postponement denied under similar circumstances. The question was important, and a denial of time to consider it, was, in his opinion, unfair and improper.

Mr. JACKSON would vote as he thought proper, notwithstanding the call for yeas and nays, and if the call had any influence upon him, it was to confirm him in a vote for postponement.

Mr. COCKE would clear his skirts, if gentlemen were determined to reject it in a pet; he should press a vote.

Mr. BUTLER was alarmed at what he saw this day; he wished to take a long and deep view of this subject, and there was not time now, the day was far spent; he rather thought the office of Vice President might be abolished, but he would not commit himself now; he wished for time, not to discredit, by a hasty decision, the States from which the Senate came.

Mr. S. SMITH regretted that a motion for postponement was made, for it has precluded all investigation; if the motion had not been made, a full investigation would have been had, and a postponement till to-morrow would have afforded opportunity to form an opinion with all the arguments in mind.

Mr. DAYTON said that he had already stated to the Senate that he conceived himself impelled by a sense of duty to offer the amendment under consideration for abolishing altogether the office of Vice President, if the change which was proposed to be made in the mode of electing the President should prevail. When gentlemen had considered the subject too important to be decided upon that day, he felt disposed to indulge them with a reasonable time for consideration, and he hoped that the postponement they asked for would be consented to. There existed, Mr. D. said, in the first volume of the Journals of the Senate, a striking monument of the hasty and inconsiderate manner in which amendments might be agreed to by both Houses. He alluded to the first of the twelve amendments, which, it was easy to show, was both absurd and impracticable. It professed to prescribe the ratio of representation for every possible increase of numbers, whereas, instead of effecting that object, it actually contained a positive interdiction of any representation, after our number should exceed eight millions. Extraordinary as it might seem, it was nevertheless most true, that it had been adopted by so many States as to have required only one more to have made it a part of our Constitution. Had it unfortunately been adopted, what, Mr. D. asked, would have been our situation, when our numbers amounted to nine millions? There could certainly be no representation in the other branch, consistently with that amendment of the Constitution, for there would either be less than two hundred Representatives, or more than one for every fifty thousand, both of which were then expressly prohibited. What would Congress have done in that case? Would they have permitted a dissolution of the Government, or would they have ventured boldly to have broken the Constitution, and, in the language of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, have thrown themselves upon the people for pardon for the breach, and upon Heaven for forgiveness for the violation of their oaths. This was the distressing, the dreadful dilemma to which the Legislature of the Union were exposed in consequence of their having bestowed too little attention to the amendments which themselves had offered to the people, and it ought surely to operate as a solemn warning upon the present and all future occasions, against proposing any alteration in the Constitution without the most deliberate consideration of its intrinsic merits, as well as of all its consequences and of its bearings upon all the other parts of the same instrument.

While he was on the floor, he would take the liberty of saying that he had not thought proper to answer the honorable member from New York, because his high respect for the Senate restrained him from replying in those terms which were due to such rudeness and such indecency of language as that in which that member had indulged himself. There would be a fitter time and a fitter place for taking that notice of it which it merited.

A motion for adjournment was now made and carried—ayes 16, noes 15.

TUESDAY, October 25.

JOHN SMITH, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, attended and produced his credentials, which were read, and the oath required by law was administered to him by the President.

Mr. FRANKLIN presented the memorial of Robert Quillin, late a private in the first Virginia regiment, and now on the list of pensioners, praying for an augmentation of his pension; and the memorial was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 24th instant, the bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, prepared in obedience to the directions of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" which was read, and the report and the papers accompanying it ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution to amend the Constitution was called up, and Mr. WRIGHT moved a postponement, till to-morrow, alleging that as Mr. CLINTON was gone home, there could not be any necessity for hurrying a vote; but as Mr. CLINTON was obliged to go home, and had brought forward the resolution by instruction from the Legislature of his State, he (Mr. WRIGHT) had thought it his duty to press a vote, so that Mr. CLINTON might have an opportunity to give his vote; but the gentleman having now gone, he was willing to afford time for considering this important question.

It was postponed accordingly.

The motion made on the 22d instant, "that the Senate now proceed to the election of a Secretary and other officers of the Senate," was resumed; and on the question, will the Senate proceed to the consideration thereof, it passed in the negative.

WEDNESDAY, October 26.

The bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for other purposes; was read the third time. And, on the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, I. Smith, J. Smith, S. Smith, Stone, Taylor, Wells, White, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, and Tracy.

And the title having been amended,

Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for the temporary government thereof."

THURSDAY, October 27.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st instant, the memorial of Joseph Harrison and others, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. WORTHINGTON also presented the petition of Martha Seamans and others, praying to be admitted to the benefits of the act, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia,'" and the petition was read, and referred to Messrs. WORTHINGTON, FRANKLIN, and WELLS, to consider and report thereon.

A motion was made that the Senate adopt the following resolution, viz:

SENATE.

Proceedings.

OCTOBER, 1803.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare the process to compel the attendance of John Pickering, to answer the charge exhibited against him by the House of Representatives at their last session."

Ordered, That this motion lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN presented the memorial and petition of the Illinois and Ouabache Land Companies, praying that the memorial presented by them at the last session of Congress, may be resumed and acted on; and the memorial was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, the resolution proposed on the 22d instant, that the Senate now proceed to the election of a Secretary, and other officers of the Senate, was resumed; and, on motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in October next.

FRIDAY, October 28.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for the temporary government thereof," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed a resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The papers last brought up from the House of Representatives were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

SATURDAY, October 29.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for the temporary government thereof." Whereupon,

Resolved, That they disagree to the said amendments, ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE and DAYTON be the managers at the conference on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same;" also, a bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, the payment of which has been assumed by the United States, by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They insist on their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for the temporary government thereof;" and agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendments, and have appointed managers on their part.

The two bills brought up for concurrence were read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee of conference on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for the temporary government thereof," reported, that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments, and agree thereto, with amendments; and a division of the report was called for.

And, on the question to adopt the report, so far as that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives, it passed in the affirmative.

And, on the question to adopt the remaining division of the report, it passed in the negative.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and agree thereto.

MONDAY, October 31.

On motion, it was

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. STEVENS THOMPSON MASON, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape around the left arm.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, That the Senate is penetrated with the full sense of the merit and patriotism of the late SAMUEL ADAMS and EDMOND PENDLETON, deceased, and that the members thereof, do wear a crape, on the left arm for one month, in testimony of the national gratitude and reverence towards the memory of those illustrious patriots.

And, on the question to agree to the resolution, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, I. Smith, S. Smith, Stone, White, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, John Smith, Tracy, and Wells.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of $11,250,000, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same," was read the second time and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, S. SMITH, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, the payment of which has been assumed by the United States, by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic," was read the second time, and referred to the committee last named, to consider and report thereon.

TUESDAY, November 1.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of $11,250,000, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same;" and to whom also was referred the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, the payment of which has been assumed by the United States, by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April 1803, between the United States and the French Republic," reported, that the said bills severally pass without amendment.

Ordered, That the bill last mentioned pass to the third reading.

Mr. WORTHINGTON presented the petition of John Crouse, and others, residents and purchasers of lands in the State of Ohio, praying for certain alterations in the existing laws of the United States, respecting the sale of the public lands; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to a committee, to consist of five members, with instructions to inquire if any, and, if any, what, alterations, are necessary in the laws of the United States providing for the sale of the public lands, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and that Messrs. TRACY, WORTHINGTON, BRECKENRIDGE, BALDWIN, and FRANKLIN, constitute this committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of $11,250,000, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same;" and, after debate,

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

The following report was taken into consideration:

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Harrison and others, resident in that part of the Indiana Territory which lies north of an east and west line, extending through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, report,

That it appears from the census taken under the authority of the United States in the year 1800, the territory above described contained three thousand nine hundred and seventy-two free white inhabitants at that time.

It also appears, from the best information that the committee have been able to obtain, that these inhabitants are separated from the other settlements of the Indiana Territory, by a tract of the Indian country, at least three hundred and fifty miles in extent; and that Vincennes, the seat of Government of the Indiana Territory, and place of residence of the Governor and other officers appointed to govern the same, is still more distant.

The committee are of opinion, that the local situation of the inhabitants of Detroit, and of the adjacent settlements, requires the special attention of the General Government, for reasons too obvious to every one, who will examine their geographical situations, to be enumerated.

On the one side, their settlements adjoin to, and are bounded by, the British Province of Canada; and on the other sides, are wholly encompassed by Indian tribes. Thus situated, and in a quarter so interesting to the Union, it is the opinion of the committee, that every accommodation and arrangement which would tend to populate and strengthen that quarter, and thereby enable the General Government with the least expense to maintain good order, ought to be extended to them. Were even these considerations without any weight, the committee conceive that the unreasonable delays and difficulties which must necessarily exist in the administration of justice, and the other concerns of these inhabitants, detached as they are from Vincennes, the residence of the Governor and other principal officers of the Territory, require that a separate territorial government should be extended to them. Under these impressions your committee respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorial of Joseph Harrison and others ought to be granted, and that all that portion of the Indiana Territory which lies north of a line drawn east from the southernmost extreme of Lake Michigan, until it intersects Lake Erie, and west from the said southernmost extreme of Lake Michigan until it shall intersect the Mississippi river, shall form a separate Territory, and that the said Territory shall, in all respects, be governed by, and according to, the principles and regulations contained in "An ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio," passed on the 13th day of July, 1787."

And the report was adopted.

Ordered, That the committee who made the report be instructed to prepare and bring in a bill accordingly.

A motion was made, that it be,

Resolved, That the sixth section of the seventh article of the Constitution of the State of Ohio be referred to a committee, to consist of — members, with instructions to examine and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

And it was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, November 2.

On motion, it was agreed that the motion made yesterday for a committee to examine the seventh article of the Constitution of the State of Ohio be withdrawn; and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the proposition of the convention of the State of Ohio to the Congress of the United States of America, contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of that State, be referred to a committee, with leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. WORTHINGTON, BRECKENRIDGE, and FRANKLIN, the committee who, on the 21st of October last, had under consideration the petition of Joseph Harrison and others, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, the payment of which has been assumed by the United States by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic," was read the third time, and passed.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to confer with the Postmaster General on the expediency or inexpediency of extending and furthering the carriage of the mail of the United States in covered or stage carriages."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

LOUISIANA TREATY.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same;" and having amended the bill—

On the question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WHITE moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the second Monday in December next, stating as the ground of the motion he had the honor to make, that the question was then involved in much difficulty and doubt. He could not accede to the immediate passage of the bill—that by the day he had named the Senate would be able to act more understandingly on the subject, as it would then probably be ascertained whether we are likely to obtain the quiet possession of New Orleans and Louisiana under the treaty or not, and there would still remain a great sufficiency of time to make the necessary provisions on our part for carrying the treaty into execution, if it should be deemed necessary.

The motion for postponement being stated,

Mr. WHITE rose and made the following remarks:

Mr. President, by the provisions of the bill before us, and which are thus far in conformity with the words of the treaty, we have until three months after the exchange of ratifications and the delivery of possession to pay this money in. Where, then, is the necessity for such haste on this subject? It seems to me to be anticipating our business unnecessarily, and perhaps unwisely; it is showing on our part a degree of anxiety that may be taken advantage of and operate to our injury, and that may serve to retard the accomplishment of the very object that gentlemen seem to have so much at heart. It is not at present altogether certain that we shall ever have occasion to use this stock, and it will be time enough to provide it when the occasion arises, when we see ourselves in the undisturbed possession of this mighty boon, or wherefore are we allowed these three months credit after the delivery of possession? The ratifications have been already exchanged; the French officer who is to make the cession is said to be at New Orleans, and previous to the adjournment of Congress we shall know with certainty whether the First Consul will or can carry this treaty faithfully into operation. We have already passed a bill authorizing the President to take possession, for which I voted, and it will be time enough to create this stock and to make the other necessary arrangements when we find ourselves in possession of the territory, or when we ascertain with certainty that it will be given to us.

But, Mr. President, it is now a well known fact, that Spain considers herself injured by this treaty, and if it should be in her power to prevent it, will not agree to the cession of New Orleans and Louisiana to the United States. She considers herself absolved from her contract with France, in consequence of the latter having neglected to comply with certain stipulations in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, to be performed on her part, and of having violated her engagement never to transfer this country into other hands. Gentlemen may say this money is to be paid upon the responsibility of the President of the United States, and not until after the delivery of possession to us of the territory; but why cast from ourselves all the responsibility upon this subject and impose the whole weight upon the President, which may hereafter prove dangerous and embarrassing to him? Why make the President the sole and absolute judge of what shall be a faithful delivery of possession under the treaty? What he may think a delivery of possession sufficient to justify the payment of this money, we might not; and I have no hesitation in saying that if, in acquiring this territory under the treaty, we have to fire a single musket, to charge a bayonet, or to lose a drop of blood, it will not be such a cession on the part of France as should justify to the people of this country the payment of any, and much less so enormous a sum of money. What would the case be, sir? It would be buying of France authority to make war upon Spain; it would be giving the First Consul fifteen millions of dollars to stand aloof until we can settle our differences with His Catholic Majesty. Would honorable gentlemen submit to the degradation of purchasing even his neutrality at so inconvenient a price? We are told that there is in the hands of the French Prefect at New Orleans a royal order of His Catholic Majesty, founded upon the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, for the delivery of possession of this territory to France; but which has never been done—the precedent conditions not having been performed on the part of France. This royal order, it is probable, will be handed over to our Commissioner, or to whoever may be sent down to receive possession. We may then be told that we have the right of France, as she acquired it from Spain, which is all she is bound by her treaty to transfer to us; we may be shown the Spaniards, who yet claim to be the rightful owners of the country, and be told that we have the permission of the First Consul to subdue or drive them out, and, according to the words of the treaty, to take possession. Of our capacity to do so I have no doubt; but this we could have done, sir, six months ago, and with one-sixth of fifteen millions of dollars, when they had wantonly violated the sacred obligations of a treaty, had insulted our Government, and prostrated all the commerce of our Western country. Then we had, indeed, a just cause for chastising them; the laws of nations and of honor authorized it, and all the world would have applauded our conduct. And it is well known that if France had been so disposed she could not have brought a single man or ship to their relief; before the news could have reached Europe, she was blockaded in her own ports by the British fleets. But that time was permitted to go by unimproved, and instead of regretting the past, let us provide for the future.

Admitting then, Mr. President, that His Catholic Majesty is hostile to the cession of this territory to the United States, and no honorable gentleman will deny it, what reasons have we to suppose that the French Prefect, provided the Spaniards should interfere, can give to us peaceable possession of the country? He is acknowledged there in no public character, is clothed with no authority, nor has he a single soldier to enforce his orders. I speak now, sir, from mere probabilities. I wish not to be understood as predicting that the French will not cede to us the actual and quiet possession of the territory. I hope to God they may, for possession of it we must have—I mean of New Orleans, and of such other positions on the Mississippi as may be necessary to secure to us forever the complete and uninterrupted navigation of that river. This I have ever been in favor of; I think it essential to the peace of the United States, and to the prosperity of our Western country. But as to Louisiana, this new, immense, unbounded world, if it should ever be incorporated into this Union, which I have no idea can be done but by altering the Constitution, I believe it will be the greatest curse that could at present befall us; it may be productive of innumerable evils, and especially of one that I fear even to look upon. Gentlemen on all sides, with very few exceptions, agree that the settlement of this country will be highly injurious and dangerous to the United States; but as to what has been suggested of removing the Creeks and other nations of Indians from the eastern to the western banks of the Mississippi, and of making the fertile regions of Louisiana a howling wilderness, never to be trodden by the foot of civilized man, it is impracticable. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) has shown his usual candor on this subject, and I believe with him, to use his strong language, that you had as well pretend to inhibit the fish from swimming in the sea as to prevent the population of that country after its sovereignty shall become ours. To every man acquainted with the adventurous, roving, and enterprising temper of our people, and with the manner in which our Western country has been settled, such an idea must be chimerical. The inducements will be so strong that it will be impossible to restrain our citizens from crossing the river. Louisiana must and will become settled, if we hold it, and with the very population that would otherwise occupy part of our present territory. Thus our citizens will be removed to the immense distance of two or three thousand miles from the capital of the Union, where they will scarcely ever feel the rays of the General Government; their affections will become alienated; they will gradually begin to view us as strangers; they will form other commercial connexions, and our interests will become distinct.

These, with other causes that human wisdom may not now foresee, will in time effect a separation, and I fear our bounds will be fixed nearer to our houses than the waters of the Mississippi. We have already territory enough, and when I contemplate the evils that may arise to these States, from this intended incorporation of Louisiana into the Union, I would rather see it given to France, to Spain, or to any other nation of the earth, upon the mere condition that no citizen of the United States should ever settle within its limits, than to see the territory sold for an hundred millions of dollars, and we retain the sovereignty. But however dangerous the possession of Louisiana might prove to us, I do not presume to say that the retention of it would not have been very convenient to France, and we know that at the time of the mission of Mr. Monroe, our Administration had never thought of the purchase of Louisiana, and that nothing short of the fullest conviction on the part of the First Consul that he was on the very eve of a war with England; that this being the most defenceless point of his possessions, if such they could be called, was the one at which the British would first strike, and that it must inevitably fall into their hands, could ever have induced his pride and ambition to make the sale. He judged wisely, that he had better sell it for as much as he could get than lose it entirely. And I do say that under existing circumstances, even supposing that this extent of territory was a desirable acquisition, fifteen millions of dollars was a most enormous sum to give. Our Commissioners were negotiating in Paris—they must have known the relative situation of France and England—they must have known at the moment that a war was unavoidable between the two countries, and they knew the pecuniary necessities of France and the naval power of Great Britain. These imperious circumstances should have been turned to our advantage, and if we were to purchase, should have lessened the consideration. Viewing, Mr. President, this subject in any point of light—either as it regards the territory purchased, the high consideration to be given, the contract itself, or any of the circumstances attending it, I see no necessity for precipitating the passage of this bill; and if this motion for postponement should fail, and the question on the final passage of the bill be taken now, I shall certainly vote against it.

Mr. JACKSON rose, and was replying at length to Mr. WHITE, when he was called to order by the Chair, as having departed from the question of postponement, in which decision, notwithstanding Mr. WHITE had also departed, and some members expressed a wish that Mr. J. should proceed, he immediately acquiesced, and sat down.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, November 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for carrying into effect the seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read and ordered to the second reading.

LOUISIANA TREATY.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same," was read the third time; and, having been amended, on the question, Shall this bill pass as amended?

Mr. WELLS said: Mr. President, having always held to the opinion that, when a treaty was duly made under the constituted authorities of the United States, Congress was bound to pass the laws necessary to carry it into effect; and as the vote which I am about to give may not at first seem to conform itself to this opinion, I feel an obligation imposed upon me to state, in as concise a manner as I can, the reasons why I withhold my assent from the passage of this bill.

There are two acts necessary to be performed to carry the present treaty into effect—one by the French Government, the other by our own. They are to deliver us a fair and effectual possession of the ceded territory; and then, and not till then, are we to pay the purchase money. We have already authorized the President to receive possession. This co-operation on our part was requisite to enable the French to comply with the stipulation they had made; they could not deliver unless somebody was appointed to receive. In this view of the subject, the question which presents itself to my mind is, who shall judge whether the French Government does, or does not, faithfully comply with the previous condition?

The bill on your table gives to the President this power. I am for our retaining and exercising it ourselves. I may be asked, why not delegate this power to the President? Sir, I answer by inquiring why we should delegate it? To us it properly belongs; and, unless some advantage will be derived to the United States, it shall not be transferred with my consent. Congress will be in session at the time that the delivery of the ceded territory takes place; and if we should then be satisfied that the French have executed with fidelity that part of the treaty which is incumbent upon them first to perform, I pledge myself to vote for the payment of the purchase money. This appears to me, arguing upon general principles, to be the course which ought to be pursued, even supposing there were attending this case no particular difficulties. But in this special case are there not among the archives of the Senate sufficient documents, and which have been withheld from the House of Representatives, to justify an apprehension that the French Government was not invested with the capacity to convey this property to us, and that we shall not receive that kind of possession which is stipulated for by the treaty? I am not permitted, by the order of this body, to make any other than this general reference to those documents. Suffice it to say that they have strongly impressed me with an opinion that, even if possession is rendered to us, the territory will come into our hands without any title to justify our holding it. Is there not on the face of this instrument itself some marks of suspicion? You find in the treaty not a single word relating to any substantial consideration to be paid by the United States. It says that the "First Consul of the French Republic, desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the said United States, in the name of the French Republic, forever and in full sovereignty, the said territory, with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner as they have been acquired by the French Republic, in virtue of the above-mentioned treaty concluded with His Catholic Majesty." It is true you perceive in the ninth article of the treaty a general reference to two conventions, signed at the same time with the treaty, which respect the payment of money by the United States to France, and which we regard as the only consideration for the territory ceded to us. Let us attend to the words of this article:

"The particular convention, signed this day by the respective Ministers, having for its object to provide for the payment of debts due to the citizens of the United States by the French Republic, prior to the 30th September, 1800, is approved, and to have its execution in the same manner as if it had been inserted in this present treaty, and it shall be ratified in the same form and in the same time, so that the one shall not be ratified distinct from the other.

"Another particular convention, signed at the same time time as the present treaty, relative to a definitive rule between the contracting parties, is in the like manner approved, and will be ratified in the same form, and in the same time, and jointly."

SENATE.

It is to be observed that the latter part of this article refers to that convention which stipulates for the payment of money to the French Government. But who, I ask, could understand it in this way? The convention here referred to, is said to be "relative to a definitive rule between the contracting parties." Why these dark, obscure, and unintelligible expressions? Is a consideration a "definitive rule?" The first article speaks of the cession as being made, "from a desire to give to the United States a strong proof of the friendship of the First Consul," and when you turn to the convention, which is said to establish the "definitive rule," you find a provision binding the United States to the payment of money to the French Republic, but not a word is said about its being the consideration of the cession. Suspicion hangs over the whole of this business. If the territory is, beyond all doubt, to be put quietly and peaceably into our hands, whence the necessity of sending down to receive it an imposing force? Admit that a nominal possession of the territory has been given by the Spaniards to the French, the latter it is well known have not a single soldier at any of the posts. Suppose, upon the arrival of our troops, the Spanish forces should refuse to obey the orders of the French Prefect, who then can only give you possession by the twig of a tree or the knob of a door; your army left to possess itself of the fortifications as it can, is half destroyed ere resistance by the Spaniards is overcome. In that case, shall we be willing to pay the whole amount of the fifteen millions of dollars? I trust not. If however we pass this bill, we shall have no control over the subject. We have already strong reasons for doubting the validity of the French title to the territory in question: suppose our doubts should be confirmed before the payment of this money, will you then consent to pay any part of it for what you will not be able to hold? I conceive, therefore, that I am fully justified in withholding my assent from the passage of this bill, seeing that no advantage can result from delegating this power to the President; that it may be, without inconvenience, exercised by ourselves, as we shall remain for some time in session; that even in common cases the unnecessary delegation of power is not to be justified; and that, in this particular instance, circumstances exist of a very extraordinary nature, which render it peculiarly improper.

MR. JACKSON.—MR. PRESIDENT: In answering the honorable gentlemen who has just sat down, I shall take the liberty of commencing, with repeating what I said yesterday, in answer to another honorable gentleman from Delaware, (MR. WHITE,) that every argument they have made use of would better have applied at the time the treaty was on its passage for ratification, or at the time of the passage of the bill for taking possession of Louisiana; and it appears extraordinary now, after voting, if not for the treaty, for that bill, to see those gentlemen rise to oppose the conditions to be performed on our part, when France has issued the necessary orders to comply, on her part. The delay of the passage of the bill before you may have the most fatal consequences; and if, as some gentlemen have hinted on former occasions, the French are sick of their bargain, will give them an opportunity to break it altogether, or create such jealousies between the two nations as may render the ceded territory and its inhabitants of little value to us. In my opinion, policy, as well as justice, requires, that we should comply with the stipulations on our part, promptly and with good faith, and leave no opening for complaint with the other party. We shall then stand justified in the eyes of the world, and to ourselves, not only to take, but keep possession of this immense country, let what nation will oppose it.

But the honorable gentleman (MR. WELLS) has said that the French have no title, and, having no title herself, we can derive none from her. Is not, I ask, the King of Spain's proclamation, declaring the cession of Louisiana to France, and his orders to his Governor and officers to deliver it to France, a title? Do nations give any other? I believe the honorable gentleman can find no solitary instance of feofment or conveyance between States. The Treaty of St. Ildefonso was the groundwork of the cession, and whatever might have been the terms to be performed by France, the King of Spain's proclamation and orders have declared to all the world that they were complied with. The honorable gentleman, however, insists that there is no consideration expressed in the treaty, and therefore it must be void; if the honorable gentleman will but look attentively at the ninth article, I am persuaded he will perceive one: the conventions are made part of the treaty; they are declared to have execution in the same manner, as if they had been inserted in the treaty; they are to be ratified in the same form, and in the same time, so that the one shall not be distinct from the other. What inference can possibly be drawn, but that the payments to be made by them was full consideration for Louisiana? But the honorable gentleman lays stress on that part of the treaty which declares that "the First Consul of the French Republic, desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the United States the territory," &c.; inferring from thence that our title rests on the friendship of Bonaparte alone. Sir, let my opinion of the present Government of France be what it may, and I confess it is not very favorable, Bonaparte, by the consent of the nation, is placed at its head; he is the organ through which the will of the nation is expressed, and is and must be respected as such by all other Powers. No nation has a right to interfere with the rule or police of another. It is enough that the nation wills it, and Bonaparte's act is the act of the whole nation, which cannot recall it, even if Bonaparte should cease to govern, and another form of Government be adopted. But, sir, admitting the objection of the honorable gentleman, in its utmost latitude, as to pecuniary considerations; are there no other considerations among Powers and Potentates? Does not policy sometimes induce a cession of territory to prevent a larger portion from being sacrificed? Is not the establishment of a Monarch's connexions sometimes an object and consideration for a cession? The very instance before us is a convincing proof—the establishment of the King of Etruria in Italy. Honorable gentlemen have, however, whenever the treaty has been the subject of debate, expressed their fears that the Treaty of Ildefonso has not been complied fully with by France; that Spain will keep possession, and that we shall be involved in war with that Power. The King of Spain's proclamation fully satisfies me on that head, and I hope, and believe, he will be more prudent than in existing circumstances to involve himself in war with us. The English nation, after the handsome letter of Lord Hawkesbury to our Minister, Mr. King, expressing the approval of His Britannic Majesty of the treaty, cannot, in decency, interfere; and Bonaparte is bound in honor and good faith, to protect us in the possession of that country; disgrace would cover him and his nation if he took any part against us. Whom, then, should we have to contend with? With the bayonets of the intrepid French grenadiers, as the honorable gentleman from Delaware, last session, told us, or with the enervated, degraded, and emaciated Spaniards? Shall we be told now that we are no match for these emaciated beings? Last session we were impressed with the necessity of taking immediate possession of the island of New Orleans in the face of two nations, and now we entertain doubts if we can combat the weakest of those Powers; and we are further told we are going to sacrifice the immense sum of fifteen millions of dollars, and have to go to war with Spain, for the country, afterwards; when, last session, war was to take place at all events, and no costs were equal to the object. Gentlemen seem to be displeased, because we have procured it peaceably, and at probably ten times less expense than it would have cost us had we taken forcible possession of New Orleans alone, which, I am persuaded, would have involved us in a war, which would have saddled us with a debt of from one to two hundred millions, and perhaps have lost New Orleans, and the right of deposit, after all. I again repeat, sir, that I do not believe that Spain will venture war with the United States. I believe she dare not; if she does, she will pay the costs. The Floridas will be immediately ours; they will almost take themselves. The inhabitants pant for the blessings of your equal and wise Government; they ardently long to become a part of the United States. An officer, duly authorized and armed with the bare proclamation of the President, would go near to take them; the inhabitants by hundreds would flock to his standard, the very Spanish force itself would assist in their reduction; it is composed principally of the Irish brigade and Creoles—the former disaffected, and the latter the dregs of mankind. With two or three squadrons of dragoons, and the same number of companies of infantry, not a doubt ought to exist of the total conquest of East Florida by an officer of tolerable talents. Exclusive, however, of the loss of the Floridas, to use the language of a late member of Congress, the road to Mexico is now open to us, which, if Spain acts in an amicable way, I wish may, and hope will, be shut, as respects the United States forever. For these reasons, I think, sir, Spain will avoid a war, in which she has nothing to gain and everything to lose. But what possession, say the honorable gentlemen, are we to receive, the twig of a tree or the knocker of a door? No, sir, I reply; but possession of New Orleans, the capital, and its defence. By whom, will the honorable gentleman ask? I answer, the same men who the honorable gentlemen were so anxious to send forward and take forcible possession the last session, which could not have failed to involve us with the French, for, if we had succeeded and taken possession, whose territory should we have violated? Spain was barely the tenant, at will, of France, and France the real owner. If, in private life, I were to enter a house the honorable gentleman had purchased, and kick his tenant out, would he not feel aggrieved and seek redress? So would France, if we had rashly taken the measures proposed, and what should we have had then to do? Fling ourselves at once into the arms of Britain for protection. Is this what honorable gentlemen wish? It cannot be. I hope, Mr. President, that the citizens of the United States will never see the day when their defence shall depend on a British army or navy, or the army or navy of any other Power on earth. We are happily divided from the distractions and tumults of the Eastern world by the Atlantic Ocean, and I trust we shall steer clear of entangling alliances with any of them.

Mr. President, the honorable gentleman appears to be extremely apprehensive of vesting the powers delegated by the bill, now on its passage, in the President, and wishes to retain it in the Legislature. Is this a Legislative or an Executive business? Assuredly, in my mind, of the latter nature. The President gave instructions for, and, with our consent, ratified the treaty. We have given him the power to take possession, which his officers are, perhaps, at this moment doing; and surely, as the ostensible party, the representative of the sovereignty to whom France will alone look, he ought to possess the power of fulfilling our part of the contract. Gentlemen, indeed, had doubted, on a former occasion, the propriety of giving the President the power of taking possession and organizing a temporary government, which every inferior officer, in case of conquest or cession, from the general to the subaltern, if commanding, has a right to do; but I little expected these doubts, after we had gone so far. For my part, sir, I have none of those fears. I believe the President will be as cautious as ourselves, and the bill is as carefully worded as possible; for the money is not to be paid until after Louisiana shall be placed in our possession.

Sir, it has been observed by a gentleman in debate yesterday, (Mr. WHITE,) that Louisiana would become a grievance to us, and that we might as well attempt to prevent fish from swimming in water, as to prevent our citizens from going across the Mississippi. The honorable gentleman is not so well acquainted with the frontier citizens as I am. I see an honorable gentleman in my view, who knows whether or not what I am going to assert be the fact—he was part of the time high in office, (Mr. PICKERING.) The citizens of the State I represent, scattered along an Indian frontier of from three to four hundred miles, have been restrained, except with one solitary instance, by two or three companies of infantry and a handful of dragoons, from crossing over artificial lines and water-courses, sometimes dry, into the Indian country, after their own cattle, which no human prudence could prevent from crossing to a finer and more luxuriant range, and this too at a time when the feelings of Georgians were alive to the injuries they had received by the New York Treaty with the Creek Indians, which took Tallassee county from them, after even three Commissioners appointed by the United States had reported to the President that it was bona fide the property of Georgia, and sold under as fair a contract as could be formed by a civilized with an uncivilized society. If the Georgians, under these circumstances, were restrained from going on their ground, cannot means be devised to prevent citizens crossing into Louisiana? The frontier people are not the people they are represented; they will listen to reason, and respect the laws of their country; it cannot be their wish, it is not their interest to go to Louisiana, or see it settled for years to come; the settlement of it at present would part father and son, brother and brother, and friend and friend, and lessen the value of their lands beyond all calculation. If Spain acts an amicable part, I have no doubt myself but the Southern tribes of Indians can be persuaded to go there; it will be advantageous for themselves; they are now hemmed in on every side; their chance of game decreasing daily; ploughs and looms, whatever may be said, have no charms for them; they want a wider field for the chase, and Louisiana presents it. Spain may, in such case, discard her fears for her Mexican dominions, for half a century at least; and we should fill up the space the Indians removed from, with settlers from Europe, and thus preserve the density of population within the original States. For, sir, I will agree with the honorable gentleman, (Mr. WHITE,) that it will be as impossible to prevent fish in the water from swimming, as to prevent the distressed of every country from flying to this asylum of the oppressed of the human race. They will come from the ambitious and distracted States of Europe to our mild and happy Government, if they commit themselves to the mercy of the ocean, or on a few planks nailed together. In a century, sir, we shall be well populated, and prepared to extend our settlements, and that world of itself will present itself to our approaches, and instead of the description given of it by the honorable gentleman, of making it a howling wilderness, where no civilized foot shall ever tread, if we could return at the proper period we should find it the seat of science and civilization.

Mr. President, in whatever shape I view this bill, I conceive it all-important that it should pass without a moment's delay. We have a bargain now in our power, which, once missed, we never shall have again. Let us close our part of the contract by the passage of this bill, let us leave no opportunity for any Power to charge us with a want of good faith; and having executed our stipulations in good faith we can appeal to God for the justice of our cause; and I trust that, confiding in that justice, there is virtue, patriotism, and courage sufficient in the American nation, not only to take possession of Louisiana, but to keep that possession against the encroachments or attacks of any Power on earth.

Mr. WRIGHT—Mr. President, I presumed, from the observations of the honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WELLS,) that he had not minutely attended to the provisions of this bill, on which the transfer of this stock is made expressly to depend. The treaty has in the most guarded manner secured us in the possession of the ceded territory, as a condition precedent the payment of the purchase money, and this bill has expressly provided that no part of the stock shall be transferred till the possession stipulated by the treaty shall have been obtained. Not such a possession as the gentlemen has said the President may be satisfied with—"the delivery of a twig and turf, or the knocker of a door." The treaty has defined the possession intended, it is the possession of Louisiana, the island and city of New Orleans, with the forts and arsenals, the troops having been withdrawn from thence. But, sir, from his remarks, it would seem that his objections to this bill had been predicated on his want of confidence in the Executive, as he has expressed his fears that the stock would be transferred, before the pre-requisite conditions had been performed. He says, we ought to be satisfied that the possession stipulated by the treaty shall have been delivered up before we pass this bill. Has he forgot that, by the Constitution, the President is to superintend the execution of the law? Or has he forgot that treaties are the supreme law of the land? Or why, while he professes to respect this Constitution, does he oppose the commission of the execution of this law to that organ of the Government to which it has been assigned by the Constitution? Why, I ask, does he distrust the President? Has he not been throughout the whole of this business very much alive to the peaceful acquisition of this immense territory, and the invaluable waters of the Mississippi? A property which, but the other day, we were told was all-important, and so necessary to our political existence that if it was not obtained the Western people would sever themselves from the Union. This property, for which countless millions were then proposed to be expended, and the best blood of our citizens to be shed, and which then was to be had at all hazards, per fas aut per nefas, seems now to have lost its worth, and it would seem as if some gentlemen could not be satisfied with the purchase, because our title was not recorded in the blood of its inhabitants. But that this is not the wish of the American people, has been unequivocally declared by their immediate representatives in Congress, as well as by this House, who had each expressed their approbation of the peaceful title we had acquired, by majorities I thought not to be misunderstood. And the gentleman, although he voted for the ratification of the treaty, now again calls on us to investigate the title. It is certainly too late. But I ask, if he was not possessed of the most satisfactory evidence of the title, why he consented to the ratification of the treaty? Does he not know that France, the original proprietor, ceded it to Spain? Does he not know that Spain retroceded it to France, in exchange for Tuscany, which is now held as the kingdom of Etruria, by the King of Etruria, the relative of His Catholic Majesty, by virtue of that exchange? Does he not know that Spain disclaims all title to it, and has issued the royal order for delivering it to France under its original limits, and that that order was lately in the possession of the Minister of the French Republic near the United States? that the treaties had been ratified and exchanged for the sale of Louisiana to the United States, and that the Minister of the First Consul had concerted with our Government such measures as were deemed necessary to put us in possession of the ceded territory, agreeably to the treaty? How correct, then, it may be to investigate the title after we have ratified the treaty, and become thereby the purchasers, or how prudent to question that title when claiming under it, are questions the gentleman's own feelings will best decide! But of this I am sure, that we can have no just cause of complaint against the French Republic until an eviction under a pre-existing title paramount, which Spain herself disclaims. But if after we shall be in possession, under this peaceful, this legitimate title, any Power on earth shall attempt to disturb our possession; I trust we can obtain injunctions from our Secretaries of War and of the Navy, and secure our title in the way it was wished by some gentleman to have been originally obtained. The gentleman tells us he understands we are to be opposed by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty in taking possession of the ceded territory, or why send so many troops to take possession? I cannot tell where the gentleman got his information, either as to the opposition intended or the number of troops to be sent. I have never heard there was to be any opposition, but the reverse. I have never heard the number of troops that are intended to take possession; but I hope and trust a number sufficient to preserve the forts in good order, and to defend them against any Power that may presume to invest them. This, I have no doubt, will be done, as it is committed to the President, under his high responsibility, aided by the heads of the departments to which it belongs, who will be possessed of all necessary information, and who will, I trust, do their duty in preserving and defending these important posts.

Can it be supposed that the Louisianians, who so lately gave so demonstrative proof of their loyalty in their answer to the address of the Prefect of France, will be less disposed to loyalty to the United States, when they recollect that we have treated them as our children, and ourselves, by securing them in their property and in their civil and religious liberty, agreeably to the principles of our own Constitution? Can they be so unwise as to prefer being the colonists of a distant European Power, to being members of this immense Empire, with all the privileges of American citizens? Can any gentleman seriously entertain such an unauthorized opinion—that that people, whom we have seen so lately, with so much respect to their late King, submit cheerfully to be citizens of the French Republic, will now, in direct violation of the royal order, refuse to obey it, and treasonably take up arms to resist its execution? It is as cruel as it is unfounded! But should an infatuation so treasonable beget in them insurgent principles of resistance. I hope and trust that our troops on the spot may be permitted to aid the officers of His Catholic Majesty to reduce them to reason and submission to the royal order of their King; that they may be delivered up to be brought to condign punishment, and that their treasonable project may be nipped in the bud.

I had for myself, however, supposed that from the time of the address of the French Prefect he had been in possession of and in the discharge of the civil functions of the government, and that the Spanish troops in the forts held the possession of them to preserve and protect them till the French troops should arrive under his direction; but I never did suppose that after the First Consul consented to sell that country, that he would send over his troops to take possession of it, but to surrender it; nor did I ever entertain a single doubt that after the King of Spain had sold that property to France and secured and held the property in exchange of which his royal order for the delivery of the possession was full proof, that if it was not in his power to induce the First Consul to keep it, that he would commit that integrity hitherto unsullied, by any measure violative of the faith of his own treaty.

Mr. PICKERING said, if he entertained the opinion just now expressed by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WELLS,) of the binding force of all treaties made by the President and Senate, he should think it to be his duty to vote for the bill now under consideration. "The Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."—But a treaty to be thus obligatory, must not contravene the Constitution, nor contain any stipulations which transcend the powers therein given to the President and Senate. The treaty between the United States and the French Republic, professing to cede Louisiana to the United States, appeared to him to contain such an exceptionable stipulation—a stipulation which cannot be executed by any authority now existing. It is declared in the third article, that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States." But neither the President and Senate, nor the President and Congress, are competent to such an act of incorporation. He believed that our Administration admitted that this incorporation could not be effected without an amendment of the Constitution; and he conceived that this necessary amendment could not be made in the ordinary mode by the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and the ratification by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. He believed the assent of each individual State to be necessary for the admission of a foreign country as an associate in the Union: in like manner as in a commercial house, the consent of each member would be necessary to admit a new partner into the company; and whether the assent of every State to such an indispensable amendment were attainable, was uncertain. But the articles of a treaty were necessarily related to each other; the stipulation in one article being the consideration for another. If, therefore, in respect to the Louisiana Treaty, the United States fail to execute, and within a reasonable time, the engagement in the third article, (to incorporate that Territory into the Union,) the French Government will have a right to declare the whole treaty void. We must then abandon the country, or go to war to maintain our possession. But it was to prevent war that the pacific measures of the last winter were adopted—they were to “lay the foundation for future peace.”

Mr. P. had never doubted the right of the United States to acquire new territory, either by purchase or by conquest, and to govern the territory so acquired as a dependent province; and in this way might Louisiana have become a territory of the United States, and have received a form of government infinitely preferable to that to which its inhabitants are now subject.

There was another serious objection to this treaty. It purported to contain a cession of Louisiana to the United States. The first article had often been read and commented upon; yet he begged leave to refer to it once more. It was therein stated, by the third article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, made the first of October, 1800, that the King of Spain promised and engaged, on certain conditions, “to cede to the French Republic the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it then had in the hands of Spain and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States.” Now, under this mere conditional promise of Spain, the First Consul (declaring that the French Republic had thereby an incontestable title to the country) undertakes to cede Louisiana to the United States; and how does he cede it? “In the same manner as it had been acquired by the French Republic, in virtue of the above-mentioned treaty with Spain.” That is, by that treaty, France acquired a right to demand an actual cession of the territory, provided she fulfilled all the conditions on which Spain promised to cede. But we know Spain declares that those conditions have not been fully performed; and, by her remonstrances, warns the United States not to touch Louisiana. Now we, standing (as some gentlemen have expressed themselves) in the shoes of France, can have only the same right relative to the subject in question. We can ask of Spain an actual cession, or a confirmation of the claim we have purchased of the French Republic, provided we will and can fulfil the conditions of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso; and what are these conditions? We cannot tell. Mr. P. believed that our Executive knew not what they were; and he believed, too, that even our Envoys, who negotiated the treaty for Louisiana, were alike uninformed. He believed that they never saw (for they had not intimated that they had ever seen) any other part of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, than what is recited in the first article of our treaty with France; and this defect has not been supplied by any guaranty of the territory on the part of France. She had not stipulated, nor is under any obligation, to procure the assent of Spain, as a confirmation of the cession to the United States.

Such is the nature of our title to Louisiana. We had, indeed, been told of a publication, long since made at New Orleans, of the King of Spain's orders to his officers there, to deliver possession of the province to the French Republic. Mr. P. would also take the liberty of mentioning what he had heard, and from good authority: that the Prince of Peace, more than a year subsequent to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, declared that the King of Spain (his master) had not ceded Louisiana to France.

Another honorable gentleman has entertained us with an account of the animating address of the French Prefect to the inhabitants of Louisiana, the largest portion of whom are French; and of the cordiality with which they received, and echoed, in their answer, the sentiments of the Prefect. But what were the feelings and conduct of the Spanish officers on seeing these French proceedings? Mr. P. had heard from an honorable member in his eye, (Mr. DAYTON,) that they sent for the printer, and forbade all further promulgation of the address and answer, on pain of his being sent to the dungeon, or to the mines, for life. Thus tenacious was Spain of her right to Louisiana, and thus severe in her prohibition of whatever might disparage her title.

But gentlemen rely on the royal order, now in the hands of the French agent here, for the delivery of the possession of Louisiana to the French Republic. They seem to consider it as full evidence of the cession of that territory to France; and as supplying all apparent defect of title under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. That order (said Mr. P.) is a year old. Before that time France had concluded a peace with Great Britain; and whatever the French Government should demand of Spain would be given.

It is likewise supposed that the Spanish officers in Louisiana will not dare to refuse obedience to that order; and one gentleman has expressed his opinion, in case such refusal should happen, that the American troops, whom the President should send thither, would be justified in compelling them to obey. But what if a subsequent royal order had been issued requiring those officers not to deliver up Louisiana to France, or to the United States? We have some reason to think that such is the fact; and resistance, he presumed, was apprehended. Why, else, all this parade of war? Why had the President been authorized to employ the Army and Navy of the United States, and to call forth any portion of eighty thousand militia? Honorable gentlemen, he knew, held cheap the power of Spain; they have spoken plainly their opinion of her feebleness and inability to withstand the force of the United States: and have seemed to rest the security of our title (as he remarked on a former occasion) rather on that feebleness and inability, than on the validity of the cession from the French Republic; and one honorable gentleman has said, that Spain will be left alone; that the French Republic is bound in honor not to give her any aid. The French Republic bound in honor! For ten or fifteen years past, we had known too well what were the honor and the justice of the Government of that Republic. Perhaps Spain may not resist at the present moment. She may wait until France gets the war with Britain off her hands. Then pretences will be easily found to reclaim Louisiana; and Spain, once engaged to wrest it from us by force, will receive from France, her ally, all necessary aid. Mr. P. believed that this whole transaction had purposely been wrapt in obscurity by the French Government. The boundary of Louisiana, for instance, on the side of Florida was, in the treaty, really unintelligible; and yet nothing was more easy to define. The French Government, however, would find no difficulty in the construction. An honorable member from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) had informed us, that the French Prefect, at New Orleans, told him, that as soon as General Victor should arrive with the French troops he should extend Louisiana far into West Florida.

Mr. P. said, that whatever way he turned his eyes, war was in prospect, as the final result of our pacific measures—measures deemed so wise as to have been ascribed to divine inspiration! He wished they might merit that high character; but feared, in the end, they would bear the stamp of indiscretion, perhaps of folly.

Mr. DAYTON.—As the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has quoted what was suggested by me in a former debate, to deduce from it an inference which the information I gave can by no means warrant, I must be allowed the liberty of correcting him. When I said that there existed an essential difference between the French and Spanish officers at New Orleans as to the real boundaries of the province of Louisiana, I did not mean to insinuate that this disagreement extended so far as an opposition to the French taking possession. It was a question of limits only, varying, however, so much in extent as would have produced a serious altercation between those two countries, although closely allied.

The Spanish Governor had taken it upon himself to proclaim that the province lately ceded and about to be given over to France would be confined on the east of the Mississippi to the river

Iberville, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, or in other words to the island of New Orleans; but the French Prefect on the contrary declared that he neither had nor would give his assent to the establishment of those limits, which would be regarded no longer than until the arrival of their troops.

The same gentleman (Mr. PICKERING) has said that the advocates of this measure seem to rely much more upon their power than upon their right, and in this assertion I am compelled to say that he has done us very great injustice. The title of the French is founded upon the often quoted treaty of St. Ildefonso, confirmed by the royal order signed by the King of Spain himself, so lately as the 15th October, 1802, directing the delivery of the "colony of Louisiana and its dependencies as well as of the city and island of New Orleans, without any exception, to General Victor, or other officer duly authorized by that Republic to take charge of the said delivery."

When at New Orleans in July last, I obtained from the best source a translated copy of that royal order, and can aver that it absolutely directs possession to be given without reservation or condition. It is not, and cannot be, denied that the lately ratified treaty of Paris transfers to us completely all the title acquired by France in virtue of the first treaty and order alluded to. We have, then, most incontestably the right of possession, and our object now is, by passing the bill before us to obtain the possession itself, which we can certainly never effect, consistently with good faith, if the reasonings and objections of my honorable friends from Delaware and Massachusetts should prevail. We are asked by the same gentlemen what will be the consequence if it shall appear that the royal order has been revoked? I answer, first, that it is not in the least degree probable, for neither of them pretend to have heard of such revocation, nor is it intimated in the confidential communications before the Senate. But admitting for argument's sake that it were revoked, of what avail could it be against a third party, who had in the meantime become a bona fide purchaser? Shall one nation give to another a written, formal evidence of transfer of territory, and revoke it at pleasure, especially after a third shall have been tempted and induced by that very evidence of title to contract for the purchase of it. Would an act so fraudulent be countenanced between individuals in a court of equity? Could it be justified between nations in a high court of honor? The honorable gentleman from Delaware has taken a more delicate ground of objection. He has insinuated that there exists in the knowledge of the Senate, the evidence of a serious opposition to our possessing that country, which if known to the other branch of the Legislature would probably have defeated this bill in its progress there. Allusions artfully made in this manner to documents communicated under the injunction of secrecy, place us in an embarrassing situation. Forbidden by our rules to expose the papers referred to, even in argument, we can only declare what impressions they have made upon ourselves. Every Senator must understand him; every one must have heard and read, and weighed deliberately the contents of those documents, and, for myself, I am free to avow my belief that, if known to every member of the other House, they would have had no effect against this bill, but would rather have quickened and insured its progress, for such is the influence they have upon me.

The same gentleman goes on to say, that our own Government undoubtedly expects to meet with opposition, and to be compelled to use violence, instead of receiving peaceable possession, or why should it send there so imposing a force. From what source that honorable gentleman has acquired a knowledge of the number of troops ordered down the river, he does not tell us, nor indeed how many he means when he calls the force an imposing one. If in times of peace and profound tranquillity the Spaniards have found it prudent to keep there constantly at least four or five hundred troops, could we be justified in sending no greater number when so important an act is about to be performed as the transfer of an extensive territory with the posts connected with it, and this too before we can have had an opportunity of sounding the dispositions of the inhabitants and of the Indians in the vicinity, in order to judge what effect the change will have upon them? These are wise precautions, which our Government, I presume, would take, even if they could be most certain that the delivery would be voluntary and peaceable on the part of Spain, and therefore afford no color for the presumption that they expect or intend to use violence. The bill before us is drawn up in terms which are at the same time consistent with our late treaty, and perfectly well calculated to secure our interests, for it does not authorize payment of the stocks until after complete possession of the territory. Timely arrangements, which a law only can warrant, ought to be made for preparing the forms of certificates and for creating the stock, that everything depending on us may be ready; and where can the discretionary power of transferring it in payment be so well vested as with the President, who will certainly be the first to know when we have received the valuable consideration for it, viz: actual possession? When this event happens, Congress, which the honorable gentleman thinks should be the only judge and sole depositary of this power, may possibly not be in session, and in this case, upon his plan, our plighted faith would be violated, our acquisition of the country jeopardized, and our right to it lost. If we thus seasonably take all the preliminary steps for complying with our stipulations, and obstacles should nevertheless exist to the attainment of our object, it will be seen and known that they are not of our creation, but that we stand ready to fulfil all the engagements on our part, as I trust we shall be to compel it, if there be need, on the part of others.

Mr. TAYLOR.—There have been, Mr. President, two objections made against the treaty; one that the United States cannot constitutionally acquire territory; the other, that the treaty stipulates for the admission of a new State into the Union; a stipulation which the treaty-making power is unable to comply with. To these objections I shall endeavor to give answers not heretofore urged.

Before a confederation, each State in the Union possessed a right, as attached to sovereignty, of acquiring territory, by war, purchase, or treaty. This right must be either still possessed, or forbidden both to each State and to the General Government, or transferred to the General Government. It is not possessed by the States separately, because war and compacts with foreign Powers and with each other are prohibited to a separate State; and no other means of acquiring territory exist. By depriving every State of the means of exercising the right of acquiring territory, the Constitution has deprived each separate State of the right itself. Neither the means nor the right of acquiring territory are forbidden to the United States; on the contrary, in the fourth article of the Constitution, Congress is empowered "to dispose of and regulate the territory belonging to the United States." This recognises the right of the United States to hold territory. The means of acquiring territory consist of war and compact; both are expressly surrendered to Congress and forbidden to the several States; and no right in a separate State to hold territory without its limits is recognised by the Constitution, nor any mode of effecting it possible, consistent with it. The means of acquiring and the right of holding territory, being both given to the United States, and prohibited to each State, it follows that these attributes of sovereignty once held by each State are thus transferred to the United States; and that, if the means of acquiring and the right of holding, are equivalent to the right of acquiring territory, then this right merged from the separate States to the United States, as indispensably annexed to the treaty-making power, and the power of making war; or, indeed, is literally given to the General Government by the Constitution.

Having proved, sir, that the United States may constitutionally acquire, hold, dispose of, and regulate territory, the other objection to be considered is, whether the third article of the treaty does stipulate that Louisiana shall be erected into a State? It is conceded that the treaty-making power cannot, by treaty, erect a new State, however they may stipulate for it. I premise, that in the construction of this article, it is proper to recollect that the negotiators must be supposed to have understood our Constitution. It became very particularly their duty to do so, because, in this article itself, they have recited "the principles of the Constitution" as their guide. Hence, it is obvious, they did not intend to infringe, but to adhere to those principles; and therefore, if the article will admit of a construction consistent with this presumable knowledge and intention of the negotiators, the probability of its accuracy will be greater than one formed in a supposition that the negotiators were either ignorant of that which they ought to have known, or that they fraudulently professed a purpose which they really intended to defeat. The following construction is reconcilable with what the negotiators ought to have known, and with what they professed to intend.

Recollect, sir, that it has been proved that the United States may acquire territory. Territory, so acquired, becomes from the acquisition itself a portion of the territories of the United States, or may be united with their territories without being erected into a State. An union of territory is one thing; of States, another. Both are exemplified by an actual existence. The United States possess territory, comprised in the union of territory, and not in the union of States. Congress is empowered to regulate or dispose of territorial sections of the Union, and have exercised the power; but it is not empowered to regulate or dispose of State sections of the Union. The citizens of these territorial sections are citizens of the United States, and they have all the rights of citizens of the United States; but such rights do not include those political rights arising from State compacts or governments, which are dissimilar in different States. Supposing the General Government or treaty-making power have no right to add or unite States and State citizens to the Union, yet they have a power of adding or uniting to it territory and territorial citizens of the United States.

The territory is ceded by the first article of the treaty. It will no longer be denied that the United States may constitutionally acquire territory. The third article declares that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States." And these words are said to require the territory to be erected into a State. This they do not express, and the words are literally satisfied by incorporating them into the Union as a territory, and not as a State. The Constitution recognises and the practice warrants an incorporation of a Territory and its inhabitants into the Union, without admitting either as a State. And this construction of the first member of the article is necessary to shield its two other members from a charge of surplusage, and even absurdity. For if the words "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States" intended that Louisiana and its inhabitants should become a State in the Union of States, there existed no reason for proceeding to stipulate that these same inhabitants should be made "citizens as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution." Their admission into the Union of States would have made them citizens of the United States. Is it not then absurd to suppose that the first member of this third article, intended to admit Louisiana into the Union as a State, which would instantly entitle the inhabitants to the benefit of the article of the Constitution, declaring, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the federal States," and yet to have gone on to stipulate for citizenship, under the limitation "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution" after it had been bestowed without limitation? Again; the concluding member of the article is to bestow "protection in the mean time;" incorporating this stipulation, and the stipulation for citizenship, with the construction which accuses the treaty of unconstitutionality, the article altogether must be understood thus, "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be taken into the Union of States, which will instantly give them all the rights of citizenship, after which they shall be made citizens as soon as possible; and after they are taken into the Union of States, they shall be protected in the interim between becoming a State in the Union, and being made citizens, in their liberty, property and religion."

By supposing the first member of the article to require that the inhabitants and their territory shall be incorporated in the Union, in the known and recognised political character of a Territory, these inconsistencies are avoided, and the article reconciled to the Constitution, as understood by the opposers of the bill; the stipulation also for citizenship "as soon as possible" according to the principles of the Constitution, and the delay meditated by these words, and the subsequent words "in the mean time" so utterly inconsistent with the instantaneous citizenship, which would follow an admission into the Union as a State, are both fully explained. Being incorporated in the Union as a Territory, and not as a State, a stipulation for citizenship became necessary; whereas it would have been unnecessary had the inhabitants been incorporated as a State, and not as a Territory. And as they were not to be invested with citizenship by becoming a State, the delay which would occur between the incorporation of the Territory into the Union and the arrival of the inhabitants to citizenship according to the principles of the Constitution, under some uniform rule of naturalization, exhibited an interim which demanded the concluding stipulation, for "protection in the meantime for liberty, property, and religion." As a State of the Union, they would not have needed a stipulation for the safety of their "liberty, property and religion;" as a Territory, this stipulation would govern and restrain the undefined power of Congress to make "rules and regulations for Territories."

If my construction is correct, all objections to the treaty and to this bill for fulfilling it, on the ground of unconstitutionality, are unfounded. The three distinct members of the third article will be each separately and distinctly complied with; first, by an incorporation of the territory and its inhabitants in the Union, as a Territory. Secondly, by admitting them to all the rights of citizens of the United States, under some uniform rule of naturalization; and, thirdly, by protecting their liberty, property, and religion, by "rules and regulations," to be, "in the meantime," enacted by Congress, under a Constitutional power extending to Territories, but not to States.

To prove the treaty unconstitutional, a member from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) has quoted from the sixth article of the Constitution these words: "This Constitution, and the laws of

SENATE.

'the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land;" and he has reasoned upon the ground, that the words "in pursuance thereof," referred to treaties as well as to laws. But the difference between the phraseology in relation to laws and to treaties, is plain and remarkable; laws were to be made "in pursuance of the Constitution;" treaties "under the authority of the United States." This difference, probably, arises from the following consideration. The objects of the Legislative power could be foreseen and defined; therefore laws are limited to be made "in pursuance of" the definitions of the objects of Legislative power in the Constitution. But the objects of the treaty-making power could not be foreseen, and are not defined; by confining the treaty-making power to a definition of its objects in the Constitution, it can never be exercised if no such definition exists; and by misapplying to the treaty-making power, the definitions of Legislative power, every right possessed by the latter would be opened to the former. But if the words, "under the authority of the United States," are considered as having been applied to treaties, in place of these—"in pursuance of the Constitution," which are applied to laws; because the objects of treaties are not defined; then the treaty-making power retains all the political attributes belonging to it, not inconsistent with the principle of agency or subordination, interwoven with our policy in all its parts. Among these, is the right or attribute of acquiring territory. And it was probably the absence of a definition as to the objects of the treaty-making power, which suggested the precaution of checking it by two-thirds of the Senate; thus subjecting it, in this body, to the same restraint imposed upon amendments to the Constitution. Whether these observations, in relation to the quotation upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts relied, do or do not prove that the objects of the treaty-making power are undefined by the Constitution, and that it is incorrect to condemn this treaty by applying to it definitions made for Legislative power, is immaterial, if the construction I have given of the third article of the treaty is correct; because that construction proves its constitutionality upon the principles contended for by the gentleman himself; and if so, his reasoning, founded upon a construction of the Constitution forbidding the erection of new States to the treaty-making power, whether right or wrong, vanishes into smoke, as the third article requires no such thing.

Mr. BUTLER next delivered his sentiments in favor of the bill, as well as generally in favor of the treaty.

Mr. TRACY.—Mr. President: I shall vote against this bill; and will give some of the reasons which govern my vote in this case.

It is well known that this bill is introduced to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and France, which has been lately ratified. If that treaty be an unconstitutional compact, such a one as the President and Senate had no rightful authority to make, the conclusion is easy, that it creates no obligation on any branch or member of the Government to vote for this bill, or any other, which is calculated to carry into effect such unconstitutional compact.

The third and seventh articles of the treaty are, in my opinion, unconstitutional.

The third article is in the following words:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess."

The obvious meaning of this article is, that the inhabitants of Louisiana are incorporated, by it, into the Union, upon the same footing that the Territorial Governments are, and, like them, the Territory, when the population is sufficiently numerous, must be admitted as a State, with every right of any other State.

Have the President and Senate a Constitutional right to do all this?

When we advert to the Constitution, we shall find that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may make treaties. Now, say gentlemen, this power is undefined, and one gentleman says, it is unlimited.

True, there is no definition in words of the extent and nature of the treaty-making power. Two modes of ascertaining its extent have been mentioned: one is, by ascertaining the extent of the same power among the monarchs of Europe, and making that the standard of the treaty-making power here; and the other is, to limit the power of the President and Senate, in respect to treaties, by the Constitution and the nature and principles of our Government.

Upon the first criterion, it is obvious that we cannot obtain any satisfactory definition of the treaty-making power, as applicable to our Government.

It is well known that, in Europe, any part of a country may be ceded by treaty, and the transfer is considered valid, without the consent of the inhabitants of the part thus transferred. Will it be said that the President and Senate can transfer Connecticut by treaty to France or to any other country? I know that a nation may be in war, and reduced to such necessitous circumstances, as that giving up a part or half the territory, to save the remainder, may be inevitable: the United States may be in this condition; but necessity knows no law nor constitution either; such a case might be the result of extreme necessity, but it would never make it constitutional; it is a state of things which cannot, in its own nature, be governed by law or constitution. But if the President and Senate should, in ordinary peaceable times, transfer Connecticut, against her consent, would the Government be bound to make laws to carry such a treaty into effect? Such a transfer of territory can certainly be made by the monarchs in Europe, under the head of the treaty-making power. I am convinced, sir, that only a cursory view of this subject will be sufficient to show every reasonable man that the treaty-making power in the United States cannot be the same that it is in the European Governments; and further, that the only method to obtain a sound construction of that power, as part of our Constitution, is by examining it with a view to the Constitution, and the nature and principles of our Government.

A number of States, or independent sovereignties, entered into a voluntary association, or, to familiarize the subject, it may be called a partnership, and the Constitution was agreed to as the measure of power delegated by them to the Federal Government, reserving to themselves every other power not by them delegated. In this Constitution they have restricted the powers of Congress, or the Federal Government, in a number of instances. In all these, I think the treaty-making power is clearly restricted, as much as if it had been mentioned in the restriction. For instance, Congress can lay no tax or duty on articles exported from any State. If this restriction should be violated by treaty, could it be thought valid? Congress can give no preference by any regulations of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. Can this preference be given by treaty, and the preference be Constitutional? If the treaty-making power is so extensive as not to be limited by the Constitution, we must submit to the most extraordinary condition, of seeing the parts of a Government, when acting separately, possessing more power than the whole when acting together. And this further absurdity would follow: Congress itself would be released from an equivocal restriction, contained in the Constitution in the cases mentioned; for if a treaty, containing stipulations to tax exports, or giving commercial preference to one port over another, be Constitutional, it is, of course, binding on every branch of the Government, and we should see the Government not only released from a Constitutional restriction, by such a treaty, but absolutely bound by it to act in open violation of the Constitution.

Many instances could be given, but I cannot conceive, that any sober opinion can be entertained, that the treaty-making power is not limited by the restrictions contained in the Constitution. To give a precise definition, and mark out unerring limits to the treaty-making power, by the nature and principles of our Government, is not an easy task, neither is it requisite for the purpose of obtaining clear ideas upon the point now before us.

The object of the original sovereignties, or partners to the compact, is obvious, from the Constitution itself; they united as equals in power, to promote the political welfare of all. Certain powers they gave: but no one partner can be supposed stupid enough to give power to transfer itself, without and against its consent, to the Government of Algiers, or any other despotic Government.

It is agreed, by the friends to the treaty, that the President and Senate cannot transfer a State. Let us examine the power of introducing a State. Suppose Louisiana contain ten millions of inhabitants; or, for the sake of argument, let it be supposed that we had a President inclined to monarchical principles, and he lived in the northern part of the Union, say in Connecticut or Massachusetts, and that two-thirds of the Senate were with him in sentiment, and that the four northern provinces of Great Britain contained ten millions of inhabitants, and were all determined monarchists, would the parties of the Union say it was competent and Constitutional for the President and Senate to introduce these ten millions of monarchists, who could at once out vote us all; and even give fifteen millions of dollars for the benefit of having them?

The principles of our Government, the original ideas and rights of the partners to the compact, forbid such a measure; and without the consent of all the partners, no such thing can be done.

The principle of admission, in the case of Louisiana, is the same as if it contained ten millions of inhabitants; and the principles of these people are probably as hostile to our Government, in its true construction, as they can be, and the relative strength which this admission gives to a Southern and Western interest, is contradictory to the principles of our original Union, as any can be, however strongly stated.

The paragraph in the Constitution, which says that "new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union," has been quoted to justify this treaty. To this, two answers may be given, either of which are conclusive in my favor. First, if Congress have the power collectively of admitting Louisiana, it cannot be vested in the President and Senate alone. Second, Congress have no power to admit new foreign States into the Union, without the consent of the old partners. The article of the Constitution, if any person will take the trouble to examine it, refers to domestic States only, and not at all to foreign States; and it is unreasonable to suppose that Congress should, by a majority only, admit new foreign States, and swallow up, by it, the old partners, when two-thirds of all the members are made requisite for the least alteration in the Constitution. The words of the Constitution are completely satisfied, by a construction which shall include only the admission of domestic States, who were all parties to the Revolutionary war, and to the compact; and the spirit of the association seems to embrace no other. But I repeat it, if the Congress collectively has this power, the President and Senate cannot, of course, have it exclusively.

I think, sir, that, from a fair construction of the Constitution, and an impartial view of the nature and principles of our association, the President and Senate have not the power of thus obtruding upon us Louisiana.

But it is said, that this third article of the treaty only promises an introduction of the inhabitants of Louisiana into this Union, as soon as the principles of the Federal Government will permit; and that, if it is unconstitutional, it is void; and, in that case, we ought to carry into effect the Constitutional part.

To this, I answer, if it is a promise only to admit into the Union, and this promise is unconstitutional, while I agree it is void, it must be agreed on the other side that it makes the whole treaty void; and that one article in a treaty being void, either from an unconstitutional or any other impossibility to carry it into effect, puts it in the power of either party to stay a fulfilment of any and every part of it. No principle in the law of nations respecting the construction of treaties, is better settled, than that every article of a treaty is a consideration for every other article: and if any one article shall be expunged, or its performance becomes impossible, the other party is released from a performance. And my opinion is, that a new negotiation upon the subject of this very article, and an agreement, on the side of the French Government, to release us from a compliance with this article, can alone render us safe in paying the money. After we have paid the money—the $15,000,000—and have fulfilled with ever so much conscientious punctuality every other part of the treaty, yet, if we refuse an admission of these people into our Union, the French may, and probably will, say that, to give the people of Louisiana the full and complete rights of citizens of the United States, was the great and leading motive in ceding to us the territory, and if we deny them that, the treaty is void, and they will take them back again, and give them the enjoyment of real liberty under the First Consul. They will be justified by the law of nations if they do so; but how shall we stand justified if we pay the money, which, with the interest, amounts to twenty-six or twenty-seven millions of dollars, and finally, get nothing for it; unless we call a breach of faith, and war with France, an acquisition?

The seventh article admits for twelve years the ships of France and Spain into the ceded territory, free of foreign duty—this is giving a commercial preference to those ports over the other ports of the United States; because, it is well known that a duty of forty-four cents on tonnage, and ten per cent. on duties, are paid by all foreign ships or vessels in all the ports of the United States. If it be said we must repeal those laws, and then the preference will cease, the answer is, that this seventh article gives the exclusive right of entering the ports of Louisiana to the ships of France and Spain, and if our discriminating duties were repealed this day, the preference would be given to the ports of the United States against those of Louisiana, so that the preference, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, which the Constitution expressly prohibits from being given to the ports of one State over those of another, would be given by this treaty, in violation of the Constitution. I acknowledge, if Louisiana is not admitted into the Union, and that if there is no promise to admit her, then this part of our argument will not apply; but, in declaring these to be facts, my opponents are driven to acknowledge that the third article of this treaty is void, which answers every purpose which I wish to establish, that this treaty is unconstitutional and void, and that I have, consequently, a right to withhold my vote from any bill which shall be introduced to carry it into effect. I acknowledge, sir, that my opinion ever has been, and still is, that when a treaty is ratified by the constituted authorities, and is a Constitutional treaty, every member of the community is bound by it, as a law of the land; but not so by a treaty which is unconstitutional. The terms of this treaty may be extravagant and unwise, yet, in my legislative capacity, that can form no excuse for an opposition; we may have no title, we may have given an enormous sum, we may have made a silly attempt to destroy the discriminating duties, yet, if the treaty be not unconstitutional, every member of the Government is bound to carry it into effect.

I shall be asked, sir, what can be done? To this question I have two answers: one is, that nothing unconstitutional can or ought to be done; and if it be ever so desirable that we acquire foreign States, and the navigation of the Mississippi, &c., no excuse can be formed for violating the Constitution; and if all those desirable effects cannot take place without violating it, they must be given up. But another and more satisfactory answer can be given. I have no doubt but we can obtain territory either by conquest or compact, and hold it, even all Louisiana, and a thousand times more, if you please, without violating the Constitution. We can hold territory; but to admit the inhabitants into the Union, to make citizens of them, and States, by treaty, we cannot constitutionally do; and no subsequent act of legislation, or even ordinary amendment to our Constitution, can legalize such measures. If done at all, they must be done by universal consent of all the States or partners to our political association. And this universal consent I am positive can never be obtained to such a pernicious measure as the admission of Louisiana, of a world, and such a world, into our Union. This would be absorbing the Northern States, and rendering them as insignificant in the Union as they ought to be, if, by their own consent, the measure should be adopted.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE observed, that he little expected a proceeding so much out of order would have been attempted, as a re-discussion of the merits of the treaty on the passage of this bill; but as the gentlemen in the opposition had urged it, he would, exhausted as the subject was, claim the indulgence of the Senate in replying to some of their remarks.

No gentleman, continued he, has yet ventured to deny, that it is incumbent on the United States to secure to the citizens of the western waters, the uninterrupted use of the Mississippi. Under this impression of duty, what has been the conduct of the General Government, and particularly of the gentlemen now in the opposition, for the last eight months? When the right of deposit was violated by a Spanish officer without authority from his Government, these gentlemen considered our national honor so deeply implicated, and the rights of the western people so wantonly violated, that no atonement or redress was admissible, except through the medium of the bayonet. Negotiation was scouted at. It was deemed pusillanimous, and was said to exhibit a want of fellow-feeling for the Western people, and a disregard to their essential rights. Fortunately for their country, the counsel of these gentlemen was rejected, and their war measures negatived. The so much scouted process of negotiation was, however, persisted in, and instead of restoring the right of deposit, and securing more effectually for the future our right to navigate the Mississippi, the Mississippi itself was acquired, and everything which appertained to it. I did suppose that those gentlemen, who, at the last session so strongly urged war measures for the attainment of this object, upon an avowal that it was too important to trust to the tardy and less effectual process of negotiation, would have stood foremost in carrying the treaty into effect, and that the peaceful mode by which it was acquired would not lessen with them the importance of the acquisition. But it seems to me, sir, that the opinions of a certain portion of the United States with respect to this ill-fated Mississippi, have varied as often as the fashions. [Here Mr. B. made some remarks on the attempts which were made in the old Congress, and which had nearly proved successful, to cede this river to Spain for twenty-five years.] But, I trust, continued he, these opinions, schemes, and projects will forever be silenced and crushed by the vote which we are this evening about to pass.

Permit me to examine some of the principal reasons which are deemed so powerful by gentlemen as to induce them to vote for the destruction of this treaty. Unfortunately for the gentlemen, no two of them can agree on the same set of objections; and what is still more unfortunate, I believe there is no two of them concur in any one objection. In one thing only they seem to agree, and that is to vote against the bill. An honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) considers the price to be enormous. An honorable gentleman from Connecticut, who has just sat down, (Mr. TRACY,) says he has no objection whatever to the price; it is, he supposes, not too much. An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) says that France acquired no title from Spain, and therefore our title is bad. The same gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TRACY) says, he has no objection to the title of France; he thinks it a good one. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) contends that the United States cannot under the Constitution acquire foreign territory. The gentleman from Connecticut is of a different opinion, and has no doubt but that the United States can acquire and hold foreign territory; but that Congress alone have the power of incorporating that territory into the Union. Of what weight, therefore, ought all their lesser objections be entitled to, when they are at war among themselves on the greater one?

As to the enormity of price, I would ask that gentleman, would his mode of acquiring it through fifty thousand men have cost nothing? Is he so confident of this as to be able to pronounce positively that the price is enormous? Does he make no calculation on the hazard attending this conflict? Is he sure the God of battles was enlisted on his side? Were France and Spain, under the auspices of Bonaparte, contemptible adversaries? Good as the cause was, and great as my confidence is in the courage of my countrymen, sure I am, that I shall never regret, as the gentleman seems to do, that the experiment was not made. I am not in the habit Mr. President, on this floor, of panegyricizing those who administer the Government of this country. Their good works are their best panegyrics, and of these my fellow-citizens are as competent to judge as I am; but if my opinion were of any consequence, I should be free to declare, that this transaction from its commencement to its close, not only as to the mode in which it was pursued, but as to the object achieved, is one of the most splendid which the annals of any nation can produce. To acquire an empire of perhaps half the extent of the one we possessed, from the most powerful and warlike nation on earth, without bloodshed, without the oppression of a single individual, without in the least embarrassing the ordinary operations of your finances, and all this through the peaceful forms of negotiation, and in despite too of the opposition of a considerable portion of the community, is an achievement of which the archives of the predecessors, at least, of those now in office, cannot furnish a parallel.

The same gentleman has told us, that this acquisition will, from its extent, soon prove destructive to the Confederacy.

This, continued Mr. B., is an old and hackneyed doctrine; that a Republic ought not to be too extensive. But the gentleman has assumed two facts, and then reasoned from them. First, that the extent is too great; and secondly, that the country will be soon populated. I would ask, sir, what is his standard extent for a Republic? How does he come at that standard? Our boundary is already extensive. Would his standard extent be violated by including the island of Orleans and the Floridas? I presume not, as all parties seem to think their acquisition, in part or in whole, essential. Why not then acquire territory on the west, as well as on the east side of the Mississippi? Is the Goddess of Liberty restrained by water courses? Is she governed by geographical limits? Is her dominion on this continent confined to the east side of the Mississippi? So far from believing in the doctrine that a Republic ought to be confined within narrow limits, I believe, on the contrary, that the more extensive its dominion the more safe and more durable it will be. In proportion to the number of hands you intrust the precious blessings of a free government to, in the same proportion do you multiply the chances for their preservation. I entertain, therefore, no fears for the Confederacy on account of its extent. The American people too well know the art of governing and of being governed, to become the victims of party factions or of domestic tyranny. They not only understand the true theory of a free government, but as well understand a much rarer thing, the true art of practising it. Had a great nation beyond the Atlantic, so often alluded to by some gentlemen on this floor, understood the practice but half as well as she did the theory, a very different result would have been produced by her revolution. I believe, sir, there are a set of general causes which operate in every Government, and either exalt and support it, or else involve it in ruin. If any particular cause has destroyed the Government of a country, some general cause has existed and produced the ruin. Whenever that general cause shall exist, it matters little whether the extent of the Republic be great or small, for its destruction is equally inevitable.

But is the immediate population of that country, even admitting its extent were too great, a necessary consequence? Cannot the General Government restrain the population within such bounds as may be judged proper? Will gentlemen say that this impracticable? Let us not then, sir, assume to ourselves so much wisdom and foresight in attempting to decide upon things which properly belong to those who are to succeed us. It is enough for us to make the acquisition: the time and manner of disposing of it, must be left to posterity. If they do not improve the means of national prosperity and greatness which we have placed in their hands, the fault or the folly will lie with them. But nothing so remote is more clear to me, than that this acquisition will tend to strengthen the Confederacy. It is evident, as this country had passed out of the hands of Spain, that whether it remained with France, or should be acquired by England, its population would have been attempted. Such is the policy of all nations but Spain. From whence would that population come? Certainly not from Europe. It would come almost exclusively from the United States. The question, then, would simply be, "Is the Confederacy more in danger from Louisiana, when colonized by American people under American jurisdiction, than when populated by Americans under the control of some foreign, powerful, and rival nation?" Or, in other words, whether it would be safer for the United States to populate this country when and how she pleased, or permit some foreign nation to do it at her expense?

The gentlemen from Delaware and Massachusetts both contend, that the third article of the treaty is unconstitutional, and our consent to its ratification a nullity, because the United States cannot acquire foreign territory. I am really at a loss how to understand gentlemen. They admit, if I do understand them, that the acquisition of a part at least of this country is essential to the United States, and must be made. That this acquisition must extend to the soil; and to use the words of their resolutions last session, "that it is not consistent with the dignity of the Union to hold a right so important by a tenure so uncertain." Now, I ask, is this "certain tenure" to be acquired, but by conquest, or a purchase of the soil? Did not gentlemen intend, when they urged its seizure, that the United States, if successful, should hold it in absolute sovereignty? Were any Constitutional difficulties then in the way? And will they now be so good as to point out that part of the Constitution which authorizes us to acquire territory by conquest, but forbids us to acquire it by treaty? But if gentlemen are not satisfied with any of the expositions which have been given of the third article of the treaty, is there not one way, at least, by which this territory can be held? Cannot the Constitution be so amended, (if it should be necessary) as to embrace this territory? If the authority to acquire foreign territory be not included in the treaty-making power, it remains with the people; and in that way all the doubts and difficulties of gentlemen may be completely removed; and that, too, without affording France the smallest ground of exception to the literal execution on our part of that article of the treaty.

Suppose, continues the same gentleman, we should discover before the end of the session that France had acquired from Spain no title to Louisiana; would you not put it out of your power to withhold the stock, by passing this bill? If such a discovery had any possibility of existence, there would be some force in the objection; but with the information before us, such discovery is impossible. By the treaty, France declares and covenants that she has an "incontestable title." Spain has sanctioned that covenant by a similar declaration that the right is in France, and has parted, so far as is in her power, with the possession, by the delivery to France of the royal order for its surrender. It would, therefore, be a strange discovery now to make, that France had no title, nevertheless the declarations and the acts of Spain to the contrary. But how could we reconcile such conduct to ourselves and to the world, after what has passed? A purchase has been made from France, and no exception taken during the negotiation to her title. The treaty has been ratified and proclaimed by the President; Congress have passed an act authorizing him to take possession. He has no doubt made the arrangements, and is at this moment carrying into execution the injunction of that act; but when we are about to fulfil the only stipulation which is important to France we are called on to hold our hands, and examine if we cannot discover some flaw in the title we have purchased. Is this a candid, a becoming, an honorable course of proceeding? Would it not rather be a diplomatic and Legislative coup de main, to avail ourselves of the possession of this country, which France and the world might justly call perfidy? It certainly would; and the rejection or even postponement of this bill on such grounds would, in my opinion, afford France no trifling pretext for the non-execution of the treaty on her part.

It is said that there is something mysterious in the very face of the treaty, for no consideration is stated to be given for this territory. The gentleman has certainly not examined these instruments with attention: and I shall merely refer him to the ninth article of the treaty. That article expressly refers to the conventions, and declares them to be a part of it. Those conventions, which are to be ratified jointly and at the same time with the treaty, state the consideration.

I had hoped, sir, that the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. Tracy,) from the trouble he was so good as to give himself yesterday in assisting to amend this bill, would have voted for it; but it seems he is constrained to vote to-day against it. He asks, if the United States have power to acquire and add new States to the Union, can they not also cede States? Can they not, for example, cede Connecticut to France? I answer they cannot; but for none of the reasons assigned by him. The Government of the United States cannot cede Connecticut, because, first, it would be annihilating part of that sovereignty of the nation which is whole and entire, and upon which the Government of the United States is dependant for its existence; and secondly, because the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution forbids it. But how does it follow as a consequence, that because the United States cannot cede an existing State, they cannot acquire a new State? He admits explicitly that Congress may acquire territory and hold it as a territory, but cannot incorporate it into the Union. By this construction he admits the power to acquire territory, a modification infinitely more dangerous than the unconditional admission of a new State; for by his construction, territories and citizens are considered and held as the property of Government of the United States, and may consequently be used as dangerous engines in the hands of the Government against the States and people.

Could we not, says the same gentleman, incorporate in the Union some foreign nation containing ten millions of inhabitants—Africa, for instance—and thereby destroy our Government? Certainly the thing would be possible if Congress would do it, and the people consent to it; but it is supposing so extreme a case and is so barely possible, that it does not merit serious refutation. It is also possible and equally probable that republicanism itself may one day or other become unfashionable, (for I believe it is not without its enemies,) and that the people of America may call for a King. From such hypotheses it is impossible to deduce anything for or against the construction contended for. The true construction must depend on the manifest import of the instrument and the good sense of the community.

The same gentleman, in reply to the observations which fell from the gentleman from South Carolina, as to the admission of new States, observes, that although Congress may admit new States, the President and Senate who are but a component part, cannot. Apply this doctrine to the case before us. How could Congress by any mode of legislation admit this country into the Union until it was acquired? And how can this acquisition be made except through the treaty-making power? Could the gentleman rise in his place and move for leave to bring in a bill for the purchase of Louisiana and its admission into the Union? I take it that no transaction of this or any other kind with a foreign Power can take place except through the Executive Department, and that in the form of a treaty, agreement, or convention. When the acquisition is made, Congress can then make such disposition of it as may be expedient.

In the search for objections to this treaty, the same gentleman has discovered that it is not the business of France to deliver possession of this country, because the second article of the convention says we are to take possession of it; and another gentleman on the same point observes that the possession may also be an incomplete one, for the President, for aught he knows, may consider the seizing a twig or the knocker of a door sufficient. Here is another instance of an objection which is refuted by a mere reference to the instrument itself; for the fourth and fifth articles of the treaty expressly stipulate that the Government of France shall send a commissary to Louisiana to receive it and all its dependencies from the officers of Spain, and in the name of the French Republic to transmit it to the commissary or agent of the United States. As to the other objection, which is founded on a doubt whether the President will take complete possession or not, it really exhibits the most unconstitutional distrust of the Executive Department which I have ever witnessed. If he cannot be trusted, who are to be the judges whether this delivery of possession be complete or not? Does the gentleman intend that the two Houses of Congress shall take upon themselves the management of this business? But greater trusts have been confided to former Presidents. Have gentlemen forgotten the law of 1798 or 1799, which enabled the then President not only to raise an army, but to go to war, if in his opinion exigencies should require it? Have they forgotten a more recent event—the resolutions proposed by themselves at the last session, authorizing the President to raise an army of 50,000 men, and take possession of this country by force? The confidence of gentlemen in the President was then abundant, indeed; but now he cannot be trusted to receive peaceable possession of that, which, but a few months ago, they were anxious to authorize him to take by conquest from both France and Spain.

Although the gentleman from Connecticut declares that he has no objection to the title of France, nor to the price agreed to be given; and although he admits the United States have power, under the Constitution, to purchase and to hold the country as territory; yet, still, he cannot vote for the measure. Has that gentleman, and those who mean to give a similar vote, well weighed the state of things which will result, in case they should be successful in their opposition?

Is not the national honor pledged to procure this right? What course do gentlemen mean to pursue to attain it? Or do they mean to abandon near a million of our Western citizens to ruin and despair? If you reject this treaty, with what face can you open another negotiation? What President would venture another mission, or what Minister could be prevailed on to be made the instrument of another negotiation? You adopt the treaty, direct possession to be taken of the country, and then refuse to pay for it!

What palliation can we offer to our Western citizens for a conduct like this? Will they be content with the refined and metaphysical reasonings and constructions upon which gentlemen have bottomed their opposition to-day? Will it be satisfactory to them to be told that the title is good, the price low, the finances competent, and the authority, at least to purchase, Constitutional; but that the country is too extensive, and that the admission of these people to all the privileges we ourselves enjoy, is not permitted by the Constitution? It will not, sir.

Without disparagement, Mr. President, to any portion of America, I hesitate not to declare that I believe the people of the Western States are as sincerely attached to the Confederacy, and to the true principles of the Constitution, as any other quarter of the Union. A great portion of them have emigrated from the Atlantic States, and are attached to them by all those ties which so strongly bind societies together. The present generation may therefore possibly be disposed to endure much. But can you hope that those attachments, or dispositions to acquiesce in wrongs, will descend to our sons? Let no such calculations, I pray you, be made either upon us, or on those who are to succeed us. They will prove fallacious. There is a point of endurance beyond which even the advocates for passive obedience and non-resistance cannot expect men to pass. That point is at once reached the moment you solemnly declare, by your vote, that a part of your citizens shall not enjoy those natural rights and advantages of which they are unjustly deprived, and which you have not the complete power to restore to them. Then it is that gentlemen may talk of danger to the Union; then it is I shall begin to tremble for my country; and then it is, and not till then, I shall agree with gentlemen that the Confederacy is in danger.

Mr. ADAMS.—It is not my intention to trespass long upon the patience of the Senate, on a subject which has already been debated almost to satiety; but, as objections on Constitutional grounds have been raised against the bill under discussion, I wish to say a very few words in justification of the vote which I think it my duty to give.

The objections against the passage of the bill, as far as my recollection serves me, are two: the first, started by the honorable gentleman from Delaware who opened this debate; the second, urged by several of the other members who have spoken upon the question.

The gentleman from Delaware admits the necessity of making the provision for carrying into execution, on our part, the treaty which has been duly ratified by the Senate, provided we can obtain complete and undoubted possession of the territory ceded us by France, in that treaty. But he observes, that the term possession is indefinite; that it may mean nothing more than the delivery of a twig, or of the knob of a door. That, from sources of the authenticity of which we have no reason to doubt, we are informed that Spain is very far from acquiescing in the cession of this territory to us; that probably the Spanish officers will not deliver peaceable possession; and that we ought not to put out of our own hands the power of withholding the payment of this money, until it shall be ascertained, beyond all question, that the territory, for which it is the consideration, is in our hands. But, sir, admitting that the word possession were of itself not sufficiently precise, I think, with the gentleman last up, that the fourth and fifth articles of the treaty, read by him, render it so in this instance. The fourth, stipulating that the French commissary shall do every act necessary to receive the country from the Spanish officers, and transmit it to the agent of the United States—and the fifth, providing, not only that all the military posts shall be delivered to us; and that the troops, whether of France or Spain, shall cease to occupy them, but that those troops shall all be embarked, within three months after the ratification of the treaty. Now, when the country has been formally surrendered to us, when all the military posts are in our hands, and when all the troops, French or Spanish, have been embarked, what possible adverse possession can there be to contend against ours? Until all these conditions shall have been fulfilled on the part of France, neither the convention nor the bill before us requires the payment of money on ours; and we may safely trust the execution of the law to the discretion of the President of the United States. For, even if I could see any reason for distrusting him in the exercise of such a power, under different circumstances, which I certainly do not, still, in the present case, his own interest, and the weight of responsibility resting upon him, are ample security to us, against any undue precipitation on his part, in the payment of the money. On the other hand, I am extremely solicitous that every tittle of the engagements on our part in these conventions should be performed with the most scrupulous good faith, and I see no purpose of utility that can be answered by postponing the determination on the passage of this bill.

But it has been argued that the bill ought not to pass, because the treaty itself is an unconstitutional, or to use the words of the gentleman from Connecticut, an extra constitutional act; because it contains engagements which the powers of the Senate were not competent to ratify, the powers of Congress not competent to confirm, and, as two of the gentlemen have contended, not even the Legislatures of the number of States requisite to effect an amendment of the Constitution are adequate to sanction. It is therefore, say they, a nullity; we cannot fulfil our part of its conditions, and on our failure in the performance of any one stipulation, France may consider herself as absolved from the obligations of the whole treaty on her. I do not conceive it necessary to enter into the merits of the treaty at this time. The proper occasion for that discussion is past. But, allowing even that this is a case for which the Constitution has not provided, it does not in my mind follow, that the treaty is a nullity, or that its obligations, either on us or on France, must necessarily be cancelled. For my own part, I am free to confess, that the third article and more especially the seventh, contain engagements placing us in a dilemma, from which I see no possible mode of extricating ourselves but by an amendment, or rather an addition to the Constitution. The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TRACY,) both on a former occasion, and in this day's debate, appears to me to have shown this to demonstration. But what is this more than saying, that the President and Senate have bound the nation to engagements which require the co-operation of more extensive powers than theirs, to carry them into execution? Nothing is more common in the negotiations between nation and nation, than for a Minister to agree to and sign articles beyond the extent of his powers. This is what your Ministers, in the very case before you, have confessedly done. It is well known that their powers did not authorize them to conclude this treaty; but they acted for the benefit of their country, and this House by a large majority has advised to the ratification of their proceedings. Suppose then, not only that the Ministers who signed, but the President and Senate who ratified this compact, have exceeded their powers. Suppose that the other House of Congress, who have given their assent by passing this and other bills for the fulfilment of the obligations it imposes on us, have exceeded their powers. Nay, suppose even that the majority of States competent to amend the Constitution in other cases, could not amend it in this, without exceeding their powers—and this is the extremest point to which any gentleman on this floor has extended his scruples—suppose all this, and there still remains in the country a power competent to adopt and sanction every part of our engagements, and to carry them entirely into execution. For, notwithstanding the objections and apprehensions of many individuals, of many wise, able and excellent men, in various parts of the Union, yet such is the public favor attending the transaction which commenced by the negotiation of this treaty, and which I hope will terminate in our full, undisturbed and undisputed possession of the ceded territory, that I firmly believe if an amendment to the Constitution, amply sufficient for the accomplishment of everything for which we have contracted, shall be proposed, as I think it ought, it will be adopted by the Legislature of every State in the Union. We can therefore fulfil our part of the conventions, and this is all that France has a right to require of us. France never can have the right to come and say: "I am discharged from the obligation of this treaty, because your President and Senate, in ratifying it, exceeded their powers," for this would be interfering in the internal arrangements of our Government. It would be intermeddling in questions with which she has no concern, and which must be settled altogether by ourselves. The only question for France is, whether she has contracted with the department of our Government authorized to make treaties; and this being clear, her only right is to require that the conditions stipulated in our name be punctually and faithfully performed. I trust they will be so performed, and will cheerfully lend my hand to every act necessary for the purpose. For I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us; and the gentleman from Kentucky himself, who has displayed with so much eloquence the immense importance to this Union of the possession of the ceded country, cannot carry his ideas further on that subject than I do.

With these impressions, sir, perceiving in the first objection no substantial reason requiring the postponement, and in the second no adequate argument for the rejection of this bill, I shall give my vote in its favor.

MR. NICHOLAS.—Mr. President, so much has been said upon this subject that but little remains for me to say, as I mean to confine myself to a few observations, that I have not heard made by others. It is extraordinary that arguments to show the unconstitutionality of the treaty, should be addressed to this Senate, to prevent its execution, after two-thirds of this body have advised and consented to its ratification. The motive for this must be what was suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina; an expectation of making impressions unfavorable to the treaty; and that, after the full discussion that has been had, the friends of the treaty would not deem it necessary to refute arguments so unseasonably repeated. The gentlemen on the other side differ among themselves. The two gentlemen from Delaware say, that if peaceable possession is given of Louisiana this bill ought to pass; the other gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to it have declared, that if they believed the Constitution was not violated by the treaty, they should think themselves bound to vote for the bill. To this Senate it cannot be necessary to answer arguments denying the power of the Government to make such a treaty; it has already been affirmed, so far as we could affirm it, by two-thirds of this body; it is then only now necessary to show that we ought to pass the bill at this time. In addition to the reasons which have been so ably and forcibly urged by my friends, I will remark, that the treaty-making power of this Government is so limited that engagements to pay money cannot be carried into effect without the consent and co-operation of Congress. This was solemnly decided, after a long discussion of several weeks, by the House of Representatives, which made the appropriations for carrying the British Treaty into effect, and such I believe is the understanding of nine-tenths of the American people, as to the construction of their Constitution. This decision must be also known to foreigners, and if not, they are bound to know the extent of the powers of the Government with which they treat. If this bill should be rejected, I ask gentlemen whether they believe, that France would or ought to execute the treaty on her part? It is known to the French Government that the President and Senate cannot create stock, nor provide for the payment of either principal or interest of stock; and if that Government should be informed that a bill, authorizing the issue of stock to pay for the purchase, "after possession shall be delivered," had been rejected by the only department of our Government competent to the execution of that part of the treaty, they would have strong ground to suspect that we did not mean to execute the treaty on our part; particularly when they are informed, that the arguments most pressed in opposition to the bill were grounded upon a belief that the Government of the United States had not a Constitutional power to execute the treaty. Of one thing I am confident, that if they have the distrust of us which some gentlemen have this day expressed of them, the country will not be delivered to the agents of our Government should this bill be rejected.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

The gentleman from Connecticut, finding himself unable to combat or refute the able and ingenious exposition of the third article of the treaty given by my colleague, has attempted to lessen the force of his observations by representing him as having given a construction to the Constitution by which the treaty-making power is rendered omnipotent. This is an artifice often practised. But in this instance, as in all others, it must fail of producing the intended effect with such an assembly as this. The gentleman from Massachusetts had read and commented on the Constitution in such a manner as to make an impression, that it was declared in the sixth article, that the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and all treaties made or to be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land. My colleague showed that the Constitution had not been correctly quoted, and stated that the expression of the Constitution was "all treaties made or to be made under the authority of the United States;" that the Legislative power was defined and that the treaty-making power was not defined, though not unlimited; and this is evident and palpable, for if the treaty-making power is trammelled in the manner that some gentlemen now contend it is, why declare that the laws made in pursuance of the Constitution and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States are the supreme laws of the land? The reason is obvious, the Legislative power is limited in a manner that it was neither intended, nor was it practicable to limit the treaty-making power. The power of legislation was only meant to be given for certain and particular purposes; all other Legislative powers were reserved to the States, whereas the whole treaty-making power of the nation was vested in the President, to be exercised with the advice and consent of the Senate. To refute the arguments of my colleague, it is necessary to show, that the powers of the President and Senate, in their treaty-making capacity, are defined and limited, either by special grants of power, which exclude powers not given, or by particular reservations. Upon an examination of the Constitution it will be found that the powers are neither specified nor are there any reservations. But it must not be inferred from this, that we believe the treaty-making power is unlimited. The Constitution imposes particular and general limitations upon the powers of the Government of the United States. No department of the Government can do any of the things that are prohibited by the Constitution. Nor would they be justifiable in not doing what is positively enjoined upon them to do. I do not believe therefore that the President and Senate would cede a State or any part of a State, because our common defence was one of the great purposes for which the Government was formed, and because the Constitution guaranties to every State in the Union a Republican form of Government, and engages to protect each of them against invasion.

If the special grants of power to Congress are to be considered as limitations of the treaty-making power, the power of making treaties does not substantially exist in this Government; and if our time would permit it, I would show that a commercial treaty cannot be formed, without interfering with the power given to Congress to regulate commerce, lay and collect duties, imposts, &c., and that no other treaty can be formed that will not require an engagement for the payment of money, or, in one way or other, the exercise of one or more of the powers vested in Congress. To make ours a practicable Government, it must be understood that the treaty-making power may negotiate respecting many of the subjects upon which Congress may legislate, but that Congress are not bound to carry into execution such compacts (where an act of theirs is necessary to give them effect) unless they approve of them. And this must be fully understood by all nations with whom such compacts may be formed. Upon every other subject proper for a national compact, not inconsistent with our Constitution, and under the limitations by me stated, a treaty may be negotiated and absolutely concluded by the treaty-making power, so as to bind the nation.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TRACY) must consider the grant of power to the Legislature as a limitation of the treaty-making power, for he says, "that the power to admit new States and to make citizens is given to Congress, and not to the treaty-making power;" therefore an engagement in a treaty to do either of these things is unconstitutional. I cannot help expressing my surprise at that gentleman's giving that opinion, and I think myself justifiable in saying, that if it is now his opinion, it was not always so. The contrary opinion is the only justification of that gentleman's approbation of the British Treaty, and of his vote for carrying it into effect. By that treaty a great number of persons had a right to become American citizens immediately; not only without a law, but contrary to an existing law. And by that treaty many of the powers specially given to Congress were exercised by the treaty-making power. It is for gentlemen who supported that treaty, to reconcile the construction given by them to the Constitution in its application to that instrument, with their exposition of it at this time.

If the third article of the treaty is an engagement to incorporate the Territory of Louisiana into the Union of the United States, and to make it a State, it cannot be considered as an unconstitutional exercise of the treaty-making power; for it will not be asserted by any rational man that the territory is incorporated as a State by the treaty itself; when it is expressly declared that "the inhabitants shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution. Evidently referring the question of incorporation, in whatever character it was to take place, to the competent authority; and leaving to that authority to do it, at such time, and in such manner, as they may think proper. If, as some gentlemen suppose, Congress possess this power, they are free to exercise it in the manner that they may think most conducive to the public good. If it can only be done by an amendment to the Constitution, it is a matter of discretion with the States whether they will do it or not; for it cannot be done "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution," if the Congress or the States are deprived of that discretion, which is given to the first, and secured to the last by the Constitution. In the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution it is said, "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." If Congress have the power, it is derived from this source; for there are no other words in the Constitution that can, by any construction that can be given to them, be considered as conveying this power. If Congress have not this power, the Constitutional mode would be by an amendment to the Constitution. If it should be conceded then that the admission of this territory into the Union, as a State, was in the contemplation of the contracting parties, it must be understood with a reservation of the right of this Congress or of the States to do it, or not; the words "admitted as soon as possible," must refer to the voluntary admission in one of the two modes that I have mentioned; for in no other way can a State be admitted into this Union.

Mr. COCKE.—Mr. President, it is with reluctance I rise, at this late hour of the day, to claim your attention on a subject that has been so ably discussed, but the deep interest the State must feel, that I have the honor in part to represent, pleads my apology, and requires that the objections made to the passage of this bill should meet my answer.

Gentlemen appear to have rested their objections on two grounds; first, the constitutionality; secondly, the expediency of passing the bill at this time; these objections when we give them their full weight, cannot appear well founded or consistent with opinions formerly delivered by the gentlemen on this floor, at a time when they contemplated taking New Orleans and the Floridas by military force. Here, however, I must except the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) and freely confess that he has been consistent, and that a manly consistency has accompanied him through the whole of this business, although I believe him to have been mistaken in point of true policy.

But what must we think of gentlemen in whom this sudden change has taken place, and who now exclaim against the passage of this bill, when we recollect that last winter they were ready to storm the Spanish garrisons, and who then promised by their valor to secure us a free trade down the Mississippi, and to make New Orleans and the Floridas their own? Did the Constitution then form a barrier against them? They must excuse me, if in point of candor, I cannot compliment them, for they have not only voted against the treaty, that secures to us more than they could have contemplated by their arms and their valor, but they have also voted against the law for carrying the objects of that treaty into effect, after the treaty has been ratified, and the exchange of ratifications taken place in due form; and now, sir, we hear those warlike spirits expressing their fears, that the Western country will soon become too powerful for the East, and that a separation must inevitably take place between us. I ask gentlemen the ground on which they build their fears. It cannot be, sir, that we have paid less respect to the laws of the Union, than any other portion of our fellow-citizens; or have we in any instance shown less regard for our Government, or its honest administration? Is it then that gentlemen had determined in their own minds to treat us with such marked indifference, or injustice, as should rouse us to just resentment? When that shall be the case, I agree with my friend from Kentucky, that there is a point, beyond which we cannot go. But let not gentlemen be alarmed at the acquisition of Louisiana, this New World as they please to call it, and which they seem at so great a loss to know what to do with. Since, sir, we have made it our own, I trust we shall find capacity sufficient to govern it. For why all those fears? Is it not the true interest of all to be united, and will not our mutual interest and love of country bind us together? It certainly will. But gentlemen appear as if they thought our late acquisition has made us too rich, and seek to know how we shall dispose of that vast country. When that shall be the question before us, there will be but little difficulty on that subject, and for myself I promise the gentleman I shall, without hesitation, say what I think will best accord with the interest, and bind in friendship, every part of the Union.

It must, however, be recollected that about six or eight months past, these gentlemen had no Constitutional objections, or conscientious scruples, on this subject. Had they then taken New Orleans and the Floridas, will the gentlemen now tell us that they intended to return it again to those from whom they might have taken it? Would they then have said the Constitution limited them to certain bounds? If so, I would ask what are the Constitutional limitations? It has none, sir, in that respect; and I contend that the treaty-making powers in this country are competent to the full and free exercise of their best judgment in making treaties, without limitation of power; for, on every subject in which that power is called to act, it must act on its own responsibility. Our Government is indeed the Government of the People; the Constitution is the instrument of their choice; it is that instrument that grants the power I contend for, and which says that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. This power then, sir, passes out of the hands of the people, by their consent, and is vested for the time limited by themselves, and until the period they have chosen for free exercise of their elective rights shall return. On the ground of expediency, little need to be said, and I hope gentlemen will excuse me if I again repeat a desire to know the extent of their objects, when they so loudly clamored for war. Were I as suspicious as themselves, I might readily indulge a belief, from the present state of things, that they wished to check the rising growth of the Western people, by getting them into a war, make them a handsome bow, and leave them to fight their battles. But, happily, our treaty secures us against all such apprehensions, and I hope we shall pass the bill now before you, as necessary for carrying into effect the conditions of our treaty with good faith.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) should have stated me more correctly; he should have said that I contended, that if his favorite plan of recession took place, that the Power to whom the recession was made would entice our citizens, by every means, and by the very means that the gentleman seems to wish to put in their power, to settle west of the Mississippi; that in an event like that, we might as well pass a law to prevent the fish from swimming up the Chesapeake as to prevent our citizens from migrating to that country. And I again warn gentlemen of the dangerous tendency of such recession, and assure them that I am not among those that believe that France, Spain, or even the British Government, would govern that country more to our interest than we do; nor do I credit a doctrine so absurd as to believe the people of the Western country will abandon their interest, and prostitute their honor, to create dangers so imminent as the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) seems to apprehend, and who is so fearful of the day in which the Western people shall give laws to the Union; but if ever it should so happen, I hope they will be at least as just and salutary as they were when that honorable gentleman and his friends formed the political majority in this House.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Olcott, Plumer, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Stone, Taylor, Worthington, and Wright.

FRIDAY, November 4.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee appointed on the 21st of October last, on the petition of Joseph Harrison and others, and on the proposition contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of the State of Ohio, reported "A bill to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments, and giving the assent of Congress to the proposition of the convention of the State of Ohio, contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of that State;" which bill was read and ordered to the second reading.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

By the copy now communicated of a letter from Captain Bainbridge, of the Philadelphia frigate, to our Consul at Gibraltar, you will learn that an act of hostility has been committed on a merchant vessel of the United States, by an armed ship of the Emperor of Morocco. This conduct on the part of that Power is without cause and without explanation. It is fortunate that Captain Bainbridge fell in with and took the capturing vessel and her prize; and I have the satisfaction to inform you that about the date of this transaction, such a force would be arriving in the neighborhood of Gibraltar, both from the east and from the west, as leaves less to be feared for our commerce, from the suddenness of the aggression.

On the 4th of September, the Constitution frigate, Captain Preble, with Mr. Lear on board, was within two days sail of Gibraltar, where the Philadelphia would then be arrived with her prize; and such explanations would probably be instituted as the state of things required, and as might perhaps arrest the progress of hostilities.

In the mean while, it is for Congress to consider the provisional authorities which may be necessary to restrain the depredations of this Power, should they be continued.

FRIDAY, November 11.

Mr. WORTHINGTON stated in his place that the State of Ohio had passed a "resolution that the Senators and Representative of that State in Congress be requested and instructed to endeavor to obtain an amendment to the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, which shall authorize the Electors of each State to designate on their ballots the person voted for as President and the person voted for as Vice President of the United States;" and the resolution was read.

Ordered, That it lie on file.

Mr. ADAMS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 4th instant, the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for carrying into effect the seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty," reported the same without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

A motion was made, that it be

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, That — copies of the laws passed the first session of the seventh Congress be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives.

And it was agreed that the motion lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from Dewitt Clinton, late a Senator from the State of New York, stating that he had resigned his seat in the Senate.

MONDAY, November 14.

The PRESIDENT administered the oath required by law to Mr. CONDIT, a Senator from the State of New Jersey.

On motion, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution proposed on the 27th of October last respecting the impeachment of John Pickering; and having agreed to an amendment thereto,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, further proceedings at present ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of this Senate by two members of the House of Representatives on the last day of the last session of Congress; and

The Message was read, and, with the digest therein referred to, ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for carrying into effect the seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty," was read the third time, and passed.

TUESDAY, November 15.

Mr. WORTHINGTON presented the petition of a number of the inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, praying to be set off into a separate district, for reasons therein stated.

Ordered, That it be referred to Mr. BRADLEY and others, the committee to whom were referred, on the 7th instant, petitions on the same subject, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

A motion was made, by Mr. ANDERSON, that it be

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the money appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the Senate, the sum of two hundred dollars each to the principal and engrossing clerks in his office, for their extra services during the last session of Congress.

And it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;'" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

WEDNESDAY, November 16.

The bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, BRECKENRIDGE, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday, to authorize the Secretary of the Senate to compensate his principal and engrossing clerks for their extra services during the last session of Congress; and, on the question to agree thereto, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion, it was agreed that the further consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the motion for amendments to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the election of President and Vice President, and also the resolution of the House of Representatives on the same subject, be the order of the day for Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. TRACY, that it be

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to lay before the Senate a statement of the payments which have been made by the respective States of the direct tax; distinguishing, as far as may be, the sums which have been paid into the hands of supervisors, and not paid into the Treasury:

It was agreed that the motion lie for consideration.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, the bill to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments, and giving the assent of Congress to the proposition of the convention of the State of Ohio, contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of that State, reported the bill with amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, November 17.

Mr. TRACY presented the petition of Ezekiel Scott, of the State of New York, praying allowance of compensation for military services; he having acted in the capacity of major in one of the regiments raised by order of the Governor and Council of that State, in the year 1781, to be subsisted at the expense of the United States; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRACY also presented the petition of Henry

The Senate took into consideration a motion made yesterday, that the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before the Senate a statement of the payments of the respective States, of the direct tax, distinguishing the sums received by supervisors, and not paid into the Treasury.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, TRACY, and STONE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

FRIDAY, November 18.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill brought up for concurrence was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 16th instant, the bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,'" reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

Mr. BRADLEY reported, from the committee appointed the 17th instant, on the motion to request the Secretary for the Department of Treasury to report on the subject of the direct tax, an amendment; which was adopted; and it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, requested to lay before the Senate a statement of the payments which have been made by the respective States, of the direct tax; designating, as far as may be, what sums have been paid into the Treasury, what sums are retained by the supervisors, what sums are in the hands of the collectors, and the persons in whose hands such moneys are; and the progress that has been made in those States from which no payment hath been received.

A motion was made, by Mr. LOGAN, that it be

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as may have been received relative to the violation of the flag of the United States, or to the impressment of any seamen in the service of the United States, by the agents of any foreign nation.

And it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

MONDAY, November 21.

The bill entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," was read the second time.

On motion to amend the bill, by adding a proviso to the end of the first section—a motion was made that the further consideration of the bill, together with the proposed amendment, be the order of the day for Wednesday next; and it passed in the negative. The motion was then resumed, to add a proviso to the first section of the bill; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, November 22,

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," together with the amendment proposed to the first section thereof; and, other amendments having been proposed,

Ordered, That the bill, together with the amendments, be referred to Messrs. SAMUEL SMITH, ADAMS, and JACKSON, to consider generally and report thereon to the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,'" was read the third time and passed.

The Senate took into consideration the motion, made on the 18th instant, relative to the violation of the flag of the United States. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as may have been received relative to the violation of the flag of the United States, or to the impressment of any seamen in the service of the United States, by the agents of any foreign nation.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the motion for amendments to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the election of President and Vice President; and, after debate,

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

The bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, BALDWIN, and SAMUEL SMITH, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 22d instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," reported the bill with amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the motion for an amendment to the Constitution in the mode of electing the President and the Vice President of the United States; whereupon, the President pro tem. (Mr. BROWN) submitted to the consideration of the Senate the following question of order:

"When an amendment to be proposed to the Constitution is under consideration, shall the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present be requisite to decide any question for amendments, or extending to the merits, being short of the final question?"

[A debate took place on this proposition, tedious, intricate, and desultory, which it was very difficult to follow, and often to comprehend.]

Mr. ADAMS was of opinion that on all questions involving the amendment two-thirds of the votes were requisite, but not on any of the forms of proceedings on the subject.

Mr. DAYTON thought two-thirds necessary on all questions upon which the amendment might ultimately depend; that the reasoning in the case of treaties would apply here as well in a single principle as on the aggregate.

Mr. FRANKLIN differed altogether from the last speaker. He considered all the preliminary proceedings, previous to the ultimate vote, subject to the decision of an ordinary majority. The motion here is a simple proposition, involving the mode of proceeding in that House, and could not affect the final vote on the amendment, which must be carried by two-thirds. The amendment will come fairly before the House for discussion by the vote of a simple majority; but subject the House to the control of two-thirds in the first instance, and discussion itself is obstructed—you can neither strike out nor insert.

Mr. WRIGHT supposed that the forms of proceeding in that House hitherto observed would not be departed from. It had never been considered that a preliminary question in proceedings was to be decided upon as a final question of amendment of the Constitution. Such a form of proceeding would leave it in the power of a minority to arrest every proposition on such a subject before it passed the threshold; and it might even put it in the power of the Vice President himself to decide a question, though in the eye of the Constitution he is not a member of the Senate at all.

Mr. MACLAY.—This appears to me a very simple question: it is no other, in fact, than whether the House may or may not determine its rules of proceeding. Now, he was convinced that the Constitution had already settled this question; by declaring that each House shall be competent to establish its own rules. It was in the nature of things necessary, and it was fair to infer that in Legislative proceedings the simplest form was most eligible: who would apply a clumsy apparatus while one simple and sufficient was at hand? The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. FRANKLIN) had made the proper distinction. Treaties bore no analogy to forms of proceeding. We may object to a treaty, in the whole or in part, even after it had been negotiated and communicated to us by the proper authority. How we shall proceed upon measures originating with ourselves is a different subject.

Mr. DAYTON never suggested that we have no right to form rules for our own proceedings: he did not consider the question itself so much a Constitutional one as of expediency.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, it was a matter of indifference to him how the House proceeded on the question, so that the rules of the Senate may not be embarrassed. The question appeared to him now to be principally the best mode of taking up the subject for deliberation.

Mr. TAYLOR.—The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) has acknowledged, and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) has concurred in the sentiment, that this amendment is not so much a Constitutional question as one of expediency and form. In this view, the gentlemen must consider that they cannot take from the Vice President a right which he possesses to a Constitutional equality in the election, as the Constitution declares (article 2, section 1) that the President "shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, be chosen for that term." No right of expediency can find room in this place: if there be any, gentlemen will of course show it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MACLAY) had felt no doubt on his mind on the subject.

Mr. BUTLER.—It never was intended by the Constitution that the Vice President should have a vote in altering the Constitution: whatever of the arguments of gentlemen relate to that point falls to the ground. The question now before the House is, whether, when a general proposition is brought up, shall the same number of two-thirds be requisite to decide upon its admission, as upon the subsequent and perfecting vote? In his opinion the same number was necessary. So, on a motion formerly made by a gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) for striking out all that related to the Vice President, he thought two-thirds were necessary to a vote of that kind, as the striking out would go to an alteration of the Constitution. On minute alterations of the letter or phraseology, which did not involve the principle, perhaps a simple majority would be sufficient.

Mr. COCKE considered the House as competent to the formation of its own rules, and was opposed to this new mode of proceeding, evidently calculated only to embarrass.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought the decision on this question perfectly analogous to the cases which arise on treaties. Suppose that two-thirds of the Senate present concur with the proposition of the bill now before the Senate from the House of Representatives, and a majority agree to strike out a part?

Mr. WRIGHT.—Gentlemen cannot or will not keep it in mind that the proposition before the House is not an alteration of the Constitution, but the formation of a proposition upon which two-thirds of the House must ultimately decide, and, after which decision, must go to the several States, and depend for its final adoption upon three-fourths of the States. It does not, as the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) seems to assume, require two-thirds of the Senate to prepare and propose an amendment to a treaty; it is the principal confirmation or ratification only that requires two-thirds.

Amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. JACKSON was not averse to a postponement; though he did not approve of the idea of the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) concerning the abolition of the Vice President's office. If the Senate would postpone, a committee might be appointed who would search for precedents, and report by Monday or on some other day. He moved to postpone, seconded by Mr. BRADLEY; lost—ayes 15, noes 16.

Mr. PICKERING.—There appears to me so close an analogy between the proposed amendment and the case of treaties, that it ought to govern. The striking out of a part of the Constitution must be considered as an amendment, for if a part is struck out it is no longer the same thing; he did not approve of subjecting a Constitution to repeated alterations.

Mr. ISRAEL SMITH.—This appears to be a very important Constitutional question; and in fixing the principle, care is requisite, though he did not see why it should not be done as early as possible. All our details of bills go through the forms of reading and engrossing; they are read and considered section by section and clause by clause, so that nothing shall be admitted but by a majority. Then, why not, in the debates of an amendment, use the same precautions? If you admit amendments to the Constitution by a common majority, it appears that there is not the same precaution.

Mr. TAYLOR.—The gentleman's arguments were entitled to an answer; but a short one would be sufficient. The analogy with treaties is no more perfect than that with relation to ordinary Legislative acts. Treaties originate with the Executive, with a power over which there is always entertained a salutary jealousy. On the other hand, a law must have the consent of the President after it has passed both Houses; if the President refuses his consent, the whole is inchoate, and two-thirds of both Houses may, non obstant, pass the law without that consent; and here only the cases are analogous. We may proceed to give a law perfection in its preliminary stages, so may we discuss an amendment; but to the ultimate perfection of the thing, two-thirds are required. If the doctrine held by some gentlemen were to prevail, it would be difficult ever to amend the Constitution, be its imperfections ever so great.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was convinced, by the arguments of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. I. SMITH,) that this was a question of the first magnitude. In the case of a law to which the President denies his concurrence, when it is returned to both Houses, no amendment can be made thereto, it must pass altogether by two-thirds, or is lost. Again: If you were to move to strike out a part of the amendment, it would appear by the vote on your journals that the question had not been decided by two-thirds. In the passage of laws it is understood that all parts of a law must have a majority of votes, but it is also well understood that different parts of the same law will not obtain the same number of votes, and that some will vote against particular parts who approve of the rest, yet that the whole must have a majority. He never doubted that a proposition for an amendment may be admitted by a majority for discussion; but it was no more a conclusion that two-thirds were not necessary on a vote involving the principle during the discussion, because there was to be a final vote, than that two-thirds would not be necessary on the last vote here, because it is not final in relation to the other House.

Mr. ANDERSON proposed to postpone the subject till to-morrow.

Mr. TRACY also wished to postpone to next day.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped the question would be decided before the House rose; and as it was a simple question of order, he wished the wholesome rule of the other House to be pursued, to decide the questions of order without debate.

The question to postpone being taken, was lost—ayes 14, noes 16.

The proposition offered by the President was then called up for decision, whether two-thirds were necessary—ayes 13, noes 18.

Mr. BUTLER desired to know from the President if the question now decided did not require a majority of two-thirds?

The PRESIDENT said, according to the rule of the House, the question required only a principal majority to decide it.

Mr. DAYTON's motion for striking out what related to the Vice President was called for, and the question taken on striking out—ayes 12, noes 19.

The report of the committee at large being then under consideration,

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out all following the seventh line of the report, to the end, for the purpose of inserting the following:

"In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and, in distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person voted for as President, having a majority of the votes of all the Electors appointed, shall be the President; and if no person have such majority, then from the three highest on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose the President in the manner directed by the Constitution. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President; and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution; but no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President, shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

Mr. ADAMS objected to the number "three" instead of five, and wished five to be restored, as the House of Representatives had already agreed to it. He asked for a division of the question; which was not agreed to.

Upon the question for striking out being put, it was carried without a dissenting voice, and the amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS adopted in the report, leaving the number blank.

Mr. DAYTON moved to fill up the blank with the number five; upon the question being put, it was lost—only eleven rose in the affirmative.

Mr. ANDERSON moved to strike out the word "two" in the nineteenth line—ayes 6. Lost.

Mr. S. SMITH then moved to fill the blank with the word "three;" which was carried—ayes 18, noes 13.

Mr. ADAMS suggested an objection to the amendment as it stood, which appeared to arise out of the treaty of cession of Louisiana. His original idea was adverse to the limitation to natural-born citizens, as superfluous; but, as it stood, the terms upon which Louisiana was acquired had rendered a change necessary, for it appeared to him that there was no alternative, but to admit those born in Louisiana as well as those born in the United States to the right of being chosen for President and Vice President.

Mr. BUTLER said that, if there was a numerous portion of those who were already citizens of the United States who can never aspire to, nor be eligible for, those situations under the Constitution, he did not see how this supposed alternative could be upheld. The people of Louisiana, under the treaty and under the Constitution, will clearly come under the description of naturalized citizens. While he was up, he would take the opportunity of speaking to the question at large, and to examine the motives which produced this amendment; the principal cause of solicitude, on this subject, he understood to be the base intrigues which were said to have been carried on at the Presidential election.

Mr. WRIGHT called to order; and a short altercation on the point of order took place.

Mr. BUTLER proceeded. He had on a former day asked if he might, in this stage of the discussion, take a view of the whole subject; the House had decided in the affirmative. When the proposition was first laid before the House, he had felt a disposition in favor of it; his mind had been shocked by those base intrigues, which had taken place at the late Presidential election, and he was hurried by indignation into a temper which a little cool reflection and some observation on a particular mode of action in that House, had checked and corrected, and finally convinced him that much caution was required in a proceeding of that nature, and that, in all human probability, such a scene of intrigue may never occur again; that it became questionable whether any steps whatever were necessary. Upon a careful review of the subject, it appeared to him that an alteration might make matters worse; for though at present there has been afforded, by a course of accidents and oversights, room for intrigue, it would be preferable to leave it to the care and discretion of the States at large to prevent the recurrence of the danger, than put into the hands of four of the large States the perpetual choice of President, to the exclusion of the other thirteen States. It was a reasonable principle that every State, should, in turn, have the choice of the Chief Magistrate made from among its citizens. The jealousy of the small States was natural; and he would not tire the House by bringing to their ears arguments from the history of Greece, because the subject must be familiar to every member of that House, and, indeed, to every school-boy. He would not weary them with the painful history of the conflicts of Athens and Sparta, for the supremacy of Greece, and the fatal effects of their quarrels and ambition on the smaller States of that inveterate confederacy of Republics. Their history is that of all nations in similar circumstances; for man is man in every clime, and passion mingles in all his actions. If the smaller States were to agree to this amendment, it would fix for ever the combination of the larger States, and they would not only choose the President but the Vice President also in spite of the smaller States. It would ill become him who had been a member of that Convention which had the honor of forming the present Constitution to let a measure such as the present pass without the most deliberate investigation of its effects. Before the present Constitution was adopted all the States held an equal vote on all national questions; by the Constitution their sovereignty was guaranteed, and the instrument of guarantee and right, he had subscribed his name to as a Representative from South Carolina, and had used all the zeal and influence of which he was possessed to promote its adoption. To give his assent to any violation of it, or any unnecessary innovation on its principles, would be a deviation from morality.

He had heard it said with confident boldness that experience had shown the necessity of amendment, and that the Constitution had already undergone correction. But gentlemen should show him that healing a wound and cutting off a limb were operations not of a different nature and different degrees of danger. He did not mean, nor did he apprehend that the proposed amendment would cut off any State in the Union, but he was persuaded that it would cut off the weight and the influence of many of the small States.

He had been told that the people of the United States called for this amendment. How had this sense been collected? It was a difficult matter to collect their sense; the great variety of habits, the diversity of climates, the space over which they are spread, the different modes of education and way of thinking, all render it difficult to ascertain the general sentiment, and he who says the people at large wish for this amendment, in my judgment, hazards greatly the respectability of character.

It is urged that the people did feel great indignation at the scenes which were exhibited in the House of Representatives on a former election; and that the people might be hurried into strong and dangerous measures to prevent the recurrence of scenes so disreputable to republican Government. But if the people knew and would see all the points tending to one extreme line, they would take care to inquire whether, in endeavoring to avoid a weather shore, they had not forgotten the lee one. If the people are to have a master, Mr. President, it is indifferent whether they are to be bowed down by an insolent individual oligarchy, or a proud and haughty aristocracy of States, if, in the change of masters, the only change that is experienced is a change of habits.

But where, sir, is the danger of letting the choice ultimately go to the Legislatures? If there is danger it is certainly wrong to send it to any Legislature; yet we find the Constitution admits of considerable Legislative authority in the organization of various Constitutional powers; the fact carries with it some evidence of the principles of that instrument. What is the purport of this amendment but to cut off a part of that solemn compact, the result of four long months' deliberation, where low ambition or the pride of States never found admission, and where disinterested patriotism and the light of virtue only found access? But, sir, there are motives operating in this body, and promoting this amendment, which, though not prominent, are powerful; it is said, if you do not alter the Constitution, the people called Federalists will send a Vice President into that chair; and this, in truth, is the pivot upon which the whole turns. When we were as Republicans out of power, did we not reprobate such conduct? Shall we then do as they did? Shall we revive party heat? No, he hoped not; but that, by a just and mild policy, we should evince that we would do as we would be done by.

The question was immediately taken, on the report and carried—yeas 20, nays 11.

Mr. ADAMS said, that though he had voted for the amendment, he disapproved of the alteration from five to three. He felt, however, though a representative of a large State, a deep interest in this question. Was there no champion of the small States to stand up in that House and vindicate their rights?

Mr. DAYTON was not here as champion of the small States; but, as the representative of one of them, he was ready to enter his protest against being delivered over bound hand and foot to four or five of the large States. The gentleman from South Carolina had offered arguments on the subject irrefutable. The little portion of influence left us he has demonstrated to be now about to be taken away, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) after aiding the effort with his vote, has taken mercy upon us, and after he has helped to knock us down, asks us why we do not stand up for ourselves.

Mr. S. SMITH was not surprised to find those who were members of the old Congress, in which the subject of large and small States was frequently agitated, familiar with the subject of those days. Under the present Constitution he had been ten years in Congress and had never heard the subject agitated, nor the least ground given for any apprehension on this subject; he had seen the small States possess all the advantages secured to them without even a moment's jealousy. The State he represented was once considered a large State, the increase of others in population however had rendered it properly belonging to neither class; it was an intermediate State; but from the natural progression of the Union it must be ranked among the small States. In this view then he could speak dispassionately, and the small States could not with reason be apprehensive that a State, which must speedily take rank among them, could be indifferent to their rights if there were the least cause for apprehension.

He had moved for the insertion of three instead of five, with this precise and special intention, that the people themselves should have the power of electing the President and Vice President; and that intrigues should be thereby forever frustrated. The intention of the Convention was that the election of the chief officers of the Government should come as immediately from the people as was practicable, and that the Legislature should possess the power only in such an exigency as accident might give birth to, but which they had considered as likely to occur. Had it not been for these considerations, the large States never would have given up the advantages which they held in point of numbers. If the number five were to be continued, and the House of Representatives made the last resort, he would undertake to say that four times out of five the choice would devolve upon them. Diminish the number to three, and the compromise of two and two between the opposing parties, which has heretofore prevailed, will be superseded by an opposition of one on each side for President, and a third between both for Vice President. The question of small and large State interests is not at all involved in this question; it is a mere matter of imagination; and if it were at all real, it would perhaps be found to operate differently from what is supposed. There are many of the States, which are now small in reference to their population, which must already feel the influence, if any exists, of their being very soon likely to become large States. Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, were of this description; in less than ten years these States will be larger than many now called large States, and their circumstances alone would be a sufficient guard against those dangers apprehended. He would be one of the last to doubt the virtue and the wisdom which framed the present Constitution; but, like other gentlemen, he was aware of the fallibility of the wisest of mankind; the founders of that Constitution had taught him the important lesson, for they had provided in that instrument a remedy for their own inexperience or fallibility; and time has in this instance, as in numerous others, proved their uncommon wisdom, for evils have arisen which though they could not foresee, they have provided the means to correct them: they could not have foreseen the danger to which the country was exposed at the late election; they could not have believed, that at so short a distance from the foundation of the Constitution, the country escaped from a civil war only from the prevalence of that kind temper, and magnanimity in the Legislature, which prevailed in the Convention itself. And shall we not do all that is in our power to avoid the recurrence of similar danger? Had the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. BUTLER) been present at this critical period, he would have felt, as many of his friends felt, a serious and restless anxiety. Two candidates before the House—party spirit high; the one determined to support the candidate upon whom public affection and confidence had unequivocally centered; the other seeking to place in the Executive Chair, not a candidate of their original choice, but a candidate through whom they wished to retain at least a share of power; unsuccessful in that effort, bringing forward a proposition to create a President; and how? By a law to be passed for the purpose, and in which the person was to be named, leaving the votes and choice of the people out of consideration altogether. Had this been effected, what other result would follow but civil war? Without pretending to be in the counsels of either party on that occasion, he believed that civil war was seriously apprehended, and so much so, that he felt perfectly convinced, that had a choice been made in the way proposed, and a person could be found to accept it, that his head would not have remained on his shoulders for twenty-four hours afterwards. Dangers of this kind he was solicitous to avoid; and by that mild and benignant mode provided by the Constitution, that of amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—In avoiding rocks he feared we were steering for quicksands. The evils that are past we know; those that may arrive we know not. The object proposed is to provide against a storm, a phenomenon not rare or unfrequent in Republics. You are called upon to act upon a calculation that all the States in the Union will vote for the same persons, or that each of two parties opposed in politics will have an individual candidate. Suppose the two candidates who had the highest votes on the late election had been the champions of two opposite parties, and that neither would recede, what then would be the consequence; according to the gentleman from Maryland, a civil war! When men are bent on a favorite pursuit, they are too apt to shut out all consequences which do not bear out their object. Thus gentlemen can very well discover the danger they have escaped, but they do not perceive that the opposition of two powerful candidates gives, besides the hazard of civil war, the hazard of placing one of them on a permanent throne. The First Magistracy of this nation is an object capable of exciting ambition; and no doubt it would one day or other be sought after by dangerous and enterprising men. It was to place a check upon this ambition that the Constitution provided a competitor for the Chief Magistrate, and declared that both should not be chosen from the same State. Here also was a guard against State pride, and this guard you wish to take away; and what will be the consequence? Instead of two or three or five, you will have as many candidates as there are States in the Union.

By voting for two persons without designation, the States stood a double chance of a majority, besides the chance of a majority of all the States in the House of Representatives. For once or twice there may be such an organization of party as will secure for a conspicuous character the majority of votes. But that character cannot live always. The evil of the last election will recur, and be greater, because the whole field will be to range in.

He hoped this amendment would not be hastily adopted. The subsisting mode was the result of much deliberation and solemn compromise, after having long agitated the Convention. It is now attacked by party; whatever gentlemen may say to the contrary; the gentleman from South Carolina has confessed it. If gentlemen will suffer themselves to look forward without passion, great good may come from the present mode; men of each of the parties may hold the two principal offices of the Government; they will be checks upon each other: our Government is composed of checks; and let us preserve it from party spirit, which has been tyrannical in all ages. These checks take off the fiery edge of persecution. Would not one of a different party placed in that chair tend to check and preserve in temper the over-heated zeal of party? he would conduct himself with firmness because of the minor party; he would take care that the majority should have justice, but he would also guard the minority from oppression. If we cannot destroy party we ought to place every check upon it. If the present amendment pass, nine out of ten times the election will go to the other House, and then the only difference will be that you had a comedy the last time, and you'll have a tragedy the next. Though it was impossible to prevent party altogether, much more when population and luxury increase, and corruption and vice with them, it was prudent to preserve as many checks against it as was practicable. He had been long in Congress and saw the conflicting interests of large and small States operate; the time may not be remote when party will adopt new designations; federal and republican parties have had their day, their designations will not last long, and the ground of difference between parties will not be the same that it has been; new names and new views will be taken; it has been the course in all nations. There has not yet been a rotation of offices in which the small States could look for their share, but the time may, it will come when the small will wrestle with the large States for their rights. Each State has felt that though its limits were not so extensive as others, its rights were not disregarded. Suffer this confidence to be done away, and you may bid adieu to it; three or four large States will take upon them in rotation to nominate the Executive, and the second officer also. This will be felt. A fanciful difference in politics is the bugbear of party now, because no other, no real cause of difference has subsisted. But remedy will create a real disease. States like individuals may say we will be of no party, and whenever this shall happen blood will follow

Amendment to the Constitution.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Mr. BRADLEY moved an adjournment. The motion was agreed to.

THURSDAY, November 24.

Mr. COCKE gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to make further appropriations for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The consideration of the report on the amendment to the Constitution being taken up; the amendment as directed to be printed on the preceding day, was taken up, and read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, viz:

In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and, in distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person voted for as President having a majority of the votes of all the Electors appointed, shall be the President, and if no person have such majority, then from the three highest on the list, of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose the President in the manner directed by the Constitution. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be Vice President; and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for the Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution; but no person Constitutionally ineligible to the office of President, shall be eligible to that of the President of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY did not approve of the amendment, as it now stood; he could not see why the Vice President should not be chosen by a majority, as well as the President. He considered the possibility of the Vice President becoming President by any casualty, as a good reason for both being chosen by the same ratio of numbers. If it should be carried as the amendment now stands, the office of Vice President would be hawked about at market, and given as change for votes for the Presidency. And what would be the effect?—that it might so happen that a citizen chosen only for the office of Vice President might, by the death of the President, though chosen only by a plurality, become President, and hold the office for three years eleven months and thirty days. He did not approve of many arguments which he had heard on the preceding day, and however disposed to concur in the principle of designation for the two offices, he could not give it his vote in the present shape. He would, in order to render the report more congenial with his wishes, move to strike out the following words beginning with the words shall, in the thirteenth line, to Constitution, in the eighteenth. The motion was seconded.

Mr. TRACY opposed the striking out, as not in order, it being an amendment to an amendment already received by the House. He thought however it would be in order to reconcile the whole, and then any part might be amended.

The PRESIDENT said that the motion for amending the amendment was not in order; but if the member from Vermont, or any other gentleman of the majority on the question yesterday, chose to move for a recommitment, or even to refer the report to a select committee, it would be in order.

Mr. BRADLEY said that he held it to be a sound truth that in legislating we ought not to be afraid of using words to express our meaning as far as language could go; he thought that there was a deficiency of words and a deficiency of meaning, which if suffered to go abroad would be attended by great inconvenience. He would move for the reference of the report to a select committee, and that they be instructed to insert in the room of the words he before proposed to omit, the words, "if such number be the majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice President."

He would also move that the committee be instructed to insert after the word President, in the tenth line, the following words: "But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the Representatives from each State having one vote; and there shall be two-thirds of the representation of the States to form a quorum."

Mr. WRIGHT, to give the gentleman an opportunity to discuss his subject, as one of the majority on the question of yesterday, moved for a reconsideration of the whole report.

Mr. BRADLEY was not disposed to favor reconsideration; the custom he took was borrowed from the town-meetings to the Eastward; if this practice were to be pursued, we should be called upon at the end of a session to reconsider the proceedings of the first, and reduce the Senate even below a New England town-meeting.

Mr. ADAMS had no objection to a recommitment, as he considered that one or two further alterations were extremely necessary. He could foresee a probable case which he thought ought to be provided against; and one or two simple expressions would answer the end. He could conceive no election to take place under the form proposed, and the election of a Chief Magistrate was not in his mind a matter of small moment. He would suppose that there should not be three persons voted for; or that, though three or more should be voted for, that none should have an actual majority. What would your situation be then? He would suppose another case, that there were two who should have the highest, and yet an equal number of votes, and that there were to be a third and fourth who should have equal numbers also—how could the three highest be found in this case, when the third and fourth persons were equally high in votes?

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Mr. TAYLOR was against the recommittal, because he had no doubt that the ingenuity of gentlemen would, upon amendment in a committee, discover new defects and motives for amendment. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY) had however stated a new idea; the Constitution does not require a majority in the choice of a Vice President, after the choice of President shall have been made, but says "in every case, after the choice of a President, the person having the greatest number of votes shall be the Vice President"—purposely omitting "a majority of the whole," as in the case of the President; but the gentleman, who disapproves of amending, wishes to carry amendment farther and to render the difficulty more difficult. He would oppose recommitment, for if this new principle were necessary the gentleman could introduce it in the shape of a new amendment to the Constitution. With respect to the simple expressions which the gentleman from Massachusetts proposed to insert, and which appeared to him to promise with so much facility such great advantages, he should be glad to see them introduced. But he thought that in one case as well as in the other, of those which he had suggested as necessary to provide against, no difficulty whatever existed. For it appeared plain enough to him that if only two had the highest numbers and equal, that one of the two would be preferred to an extension of choice to a third who had not an equal number of votes, and that the selection of one of the two would be in fact a choice from one of the three highest; so in the case of the third and fourth, though they might have also an equal number of votes, he could perceive no difficulty; if there were even four of them, the choice out of any three of the four would be a correct choice.

Mr. DAYTON—Gentlemen appear to forget that the Chair has decided that no words can be introduced into the amendment already adopted, and consequently that a recommitment is the only course left. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) objects to the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. BRADLEY,) upon the ground that it seems too sacred to touch it, as there exists already a different principle in the Constitution; but though he considers it too sacred, he nevertheless recommends as a remedy the introduction of a new resolution separately and in opposition to that sacred principle. We have been hitherto trammelled by incongruous rules, but here an amendment is proposed to be got rid of by a side wind.

Mr. TRACY could not see why a Vice President should not be chosen by a majority instead of a plurality as well as President—he was for the recommitment.

Mr. S. SMITH supposed that if the motion of the gentleman from Vermont should be lost, it would be then in order to move a reconsideration. He could not see, with that gentleman, anything exceptionable in town-meetings, nor could he discover that town-meetings in New England were more exceptionable than elsewhere, unless there was anything specially wrong transacted at them. The practice of reconsideration was familiar in all Legislative bodies; and it was in the nature of legislation that it should be so; for new knowledge as well as new circumstances render it necessary to reconsider and revive long established laws.

The motion for referring to a select committee was then lost—yeas 15, nays 16.

Mr. WRIGHT then renewed his motion for a reconsideration.

Mr. BUTLER disapproved of the rule of the House which authorized this mode of reconsideration in so loose a way; he thought that no subject discussed should be reconsidered without an unanimous vote; if that practice was pursued it would prevent a great abuse and waste of time. In the present mode it matters not whether it is a thin or a full House; any member of the majority has the House at his mercy.

Mr. TRACY did not comprehend the meaning of the gentleman in demanding a reconsideration—did he mean to reconsider the whole day's work?

Mr. S. SMITH said his colleague meant, as he meant, to reconsider the amendment made yesterday to the report of the committee.

Mr. TRACY did not suppose that the House was to reconsider the rule of order as to the majority; nor six or seven other motions; but unless the gentleman specifies the subject to be reconsidered, the motion will necessarily comprehend the whole day's work.

Mr. DAYTON understood it to be confined to the amendment of the resolution.

Mr. PLUMER requested the motion to be committed to writing; which was done, and the motion was carried.

Mr. BRADLEY then renewed his motion as before, for striking out and inserting after the 13th line; this amendment he thought of great importance, as under the Constitution as it now stands the Vice President must be a person of the highest respectability, well known, and of established reputation throughout the United States; but if the discriminating principle prevails without some precautions such as the amendment proposed, that assurance would be lost; and he should not be surprised to hear of as many candidates for Vice President as there are States, as the votes for President would be offered in truck for votes for Vice President, and an enterprising character might employ his emissaries through all the States to purchase them, and your amendment lays the foundation for intrigues. He was desirous that he who is to be set up as candidate for the Vice President should as at present be equally respectable, or that there should be none—that at least he should be the second man in the nation; adopt the designating principle, without the most guarded precautions, and you lose that assurance.

Mr. HILLHOUSE accorded with the gentleman's amendment, as it naturally grows out of the principles of the report. There was not a word in the Constitution about voting for the Vice President, no vote in fact is given for such an office; the alteration to designation alters the whole thing; and as the gentlemen has expressed, will send the Vice President's office into market to be handed about as change for the candidate supported by larger States; he would prefer leaving the choice of President and Vice President at once to the larger States than take it in this way. In calm times any government may work well, but he wished in calm times to provide against storm. If we designate any, then designate both and on equal terms.

Mr. WRIGHT's object was the discriminating principle, or the designating principle in its most simple and efficacious form; but this by no means authorized the abridging of the rights of the small States; nor could it be shown in argument that the designating principle would have such an effect. The provision that not more than one of the two candidates should be voted for in the several States, showed that the lesser States were equally guarded with the rest: upon the incidental election in the House of Representatives the same guardianship of the smaller States was conspicuous—the Union was the result of a fair compromise, and the designation in no way departs from it. The amendment proposed, so far as it went to decide the choice of Vice President by a majority instead of a plurality, as the Constitution now stands, he approved, as it was the principle most consonant with the spirit of representative democracy, that no officer should be elected but by a majority; as it now stands, admitting a choice by a plurality, there were contrary principles received. He saw no difficulty in the event of an election of Vice President not being made, as it might be done by this House. The idea he acknowledged he had borrowed from the resolutions of March 4, 1800, passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts, and forwarded to their representatives in Congress; the recommendation of an alteration in this part of the Constitution originated in Vermont, but was adopted and forwarded by Massachusetts.

IN SENATE, Feb. 28th, 1800.

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Vermont, on the fifth day of November, last, passed two resolves in the words following, viz:

“STATE OF VERMONT.

In General Assembly Nov. 5, 1799.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be, and they hereby are, requested to use their best endeavors that Congress propose to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, viz: That the Electors of President and Vice President in giving in their votes, shall respectively distinguish the person whom they desire to be President from the one they desire to be Vice President, by annexing the word President or Vice President, as the case may require, to the proper name voted for; and the person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors chosen, shall be Vice President; and if there be no choice, and two or more persons shall have the highest number of votes, and those equal, the Senate shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for Vice President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list, the Senate shall in like manner choose the Vice President; but in choosing the Vice President, the votes shall be taken by States, the Senators from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two thirds of the States; and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And in case the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress, shall find that the aforesaid amendment is not conformable to the sentiments of a Constitutional majority of both branches of the National Legislature, they are hereby requested so to modify the same as to meet the sentiments of such majority.

Provided, however, That any amendment which may be agreed on, shall oblige the Electors to designate the person they desire to be President, from the one whom they desire to be Vice President.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested forthwith to transmit the same to the Supreme Executives of the several States.”

Which resolves have been communicated by the Supreme Executive of the State of Vermont to the Supreme Executive of this Commonwealth.

Resolved, That the Legislature of this Commonwealth have a high sense of the wisdom and patriotism of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, and accord with them in the opinion, that it is expedient that the Constitution of the United States be amended in the manner contemplated in the aforesaid resolves of the Legislature of the State of Vermont.

Resolved, further That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be and they are hereby requested to adopt the necessary measures to effect the amendment aforesaid.

Resolved, further, That his Honor the Lieutenant Governor be and he is hereby requested to communicate the foregoing resolves to the Supreme Executive of the State of Vermont, and also to transmit copies thereof to the Senators and Representatives of this Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States.

Approved, March 4th, 1800.

The propriety of this House choosing its President he considered as perfectly conformable to the principles of the Constitution. The House of Representatives never vote by States but when the election of President devolves upon them; the Senate never; but he did not see why it should not be so in the event of a non-election of Vice President by the want of a majority. As to the number from which the choice was to be made, he cared not whether it were three or five—he considered the principle of designation as everything, and the number but as trimmings to the cloth. He would recommend it to the gentleman from Vermont so to alter his amendment as to render an election in the House the resort, in the defect of a majority; he was for the choice being made not in the numerical capacity of the members, but by States.

Mr. BRADLEY considered the provision of voting in the House of Representatives by States, as a good one in the particular case. But he did not think it necessary here, because this House already represents States equally; a member or members, may, it is true, be absent, but then that is a great neglect of duty, and subjects to heavy responsibility the absent member. Under the present order of things a State may have no vote, though both its Representatives are present, for A and B may vote differently; if five or six States were in the same predicament, a case not very unreasonable to suppose, then there would not be a majority.

The question was then put, and Mr. BRADLEY's motion carried.

Mr. BRADLEY then moved his amendment in the 16th line as above cited, to be inserted in the place of the words, "in the manner directed by the Constitution." He observed this amendment would render it necessary in order to avoid confusion to repeal the section which comes within its purview; if no manner of election is pointed out, it will be impossible to tell what construction to put upon it; and instruments of this important nature cannot be expressed in language too explicit. If a provision, such as is offered, should not be adopted, might not the House of Representatives consider themselves at liberty to choose by the numerical vote? It is true that any vote we may here give will not alter the principle, but it is proper that provision be now made that no mistaken interposition take place at a future time.

Mr. ADAMS said, if he understood the state of the question, the principle relates in the most important degree to the numbers from which the choice should be made—as it now stood he could not say whether three or five was the number to be chosen from; he hoped the Senate would determine whether the choice was to be made from the highest numbers in all cases; or to make provision specially for either case of five or three; if the choice was to be fixed by the number five, then he conceived that the words from the whole number, if less than five, should be introduced. He was himself in favor of the number five, because by taking three you reduce the power of the small States, and their chances in the House of Representatives; for certainly it is a much higher power to elect from five than from three. He questioned whether the House of Representatives would part from that number, for in general popular bodies are very tenacious of power; it is in their nature, and so in a degree are Senates.

Mr. DAYTON said, the remarks of the gentleman (Mr. ADAMS) in favor of small States were too precious to be lost; but he wished they had been reserved for the proper place; with regard to number likewise, it was out of place, as there was no reference to numbers in the motion of the gentleman from Vermont.

The second amendment of Mr. BRADLEY was then put and carried.

Mr. COCKE called for a consideration of the vote of the preceding day on the number in the 15th line, which he moved to strike out, in order to afford gentlemen the opportunity they seemed to wish for to discuss the number.

The motion was carried, and a blank left for the number.

Mr. COCKE.—Gentlemen had now full latitude for discussion, and he wished it would be settled so far as concerned the number, this day; he could not but express his sorrow, however, to hear gentlemen making such a stir about supposed dangers to the small States; this kind of clamor is worn thread-bare, and could not pass muster much longer; on all occasions we hear in one shape or another this opposition of States brought forward; lately it was the West was in danger; at other times the South is arrayed against the East; and now we are called upon to believe the large are going to swallow the small States; gentlemen must have a large swallow indeed who can take in these things. Another gentleman, from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) presents us another horrid spectacle; he tells us that those States must be merged in blood, and truly the remedy by which all this bloodshed is to be prevented, he tells us, is the election of a Federal Vice President! He was not surprised at this kind of remedy being recommended, but he thought it little better than a quack medicine. He believed that if the remedy was accepted, the day would not be far distant when they would come forward with another, and tell us that a Federal President was necessary to our existence. He for one was not for taking the remedies of those who, when disorder prevailed, instead of curing them, created new ones. Gentlemen would not a few years ago listen to any advice or even complaints of a minority; they think now, as they said then, that there was no talents or virtue in the country but what they possess; and they now tell us that minorities should govern. While he stood in that House he would never submit to be governed by a minority, especially a minority which, when a part of the majority, declared the then minority deserved a dungeon. We shall not treat them in that way; they shall experience no persecution; we will even endeavor to make their situation comfortable for them; but they must not expect our aid to set aside majorities, or to depart from the principles of the Constitution.

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—If the gentleman alludes to me, he is mistaken.

Mr. COCKE.—No gentleman in this House can be a stranger to my meaning—he had proposed to insert the number five in the blank.

Mr. DAYTON seconded the motion, but not for the reasons offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COCKE.—As I cannot pocket that gentleman's superior reason, I must be content to make use of that plain reason God has given me. He had heard it said on that floor, that the object of our amendment was to prevent a Federal Vice President being elected. For his personal feeling on that subject he could account; he entered into no examination of other gentlemen's feelings, but for himself he would avow that he was actuated by a strenuous wish to prevent a Federal Vice President being elected to that Chair; he could not subdue his memory, and he would not wish to see any man chosen whose attachment to Republican Government he doubted; he was against the election of any man who differed from the majority; he was as adverse to persecution as any man; he could not persecute, but he would, while he had breath, guard against all men and all parties that countenance or practise persecution for opinion's sake. He would assert the right of the majority, and entertained no sort of apprehensions from those spectres and hobgoblins, those denunciations of blood, and such declamations as were thrown out by some gentlemen, and which betrays the rancor which rankles in some gentlemen's breasts, who judge of others by themselves, and furnish the strongest argument against trusting to them. He disdained persecution, but he would guard against it. He would follow the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, which excluded the choice of minorities; which was advantageous to the minority, if it was not their own fault. We are called upon to make a choice or we are not. Will gentlemen tell us that we make a choice, if we admit what is contrary to our sentiments of right and wrong. What is the object of the amendment? To put it in the power of the people to choose those whom they think most entitled to confidence and respect. If we furnish an amendment which they do not approve they will send it back to us.

MR. TAYLOR.—This appears to be a subject of much importance, and the matter introduced into the debate had given it a more serious air than it at first assumed. To estimate a measure of a public kind we must look to the consequences which it is intended, or may incidentally produce. If the measure had the tendencies, or would produce such effects as some gentlemen surmise, it would be very serious indeed. But he would be bold to say that it was never contemplated to countenance or encourage a classification of States. No man he believed who advocated the amendment would submit to a classification of States any more than a classification of men, or the establishment of patrician and plebeian orders. Are gentlemen who hold forth these delusions conscious that the course they pursue is the only mode to excite that jealousy and distraction which they say they deprecate? Do gentlemen wish to excite an hostility of this kind, to inculcate the idea of discriminating the States into patrician and plebeian? Are they regardless of the consequences, or have they ever considered them?

How, he would ask, is this amendment to favor the large at the expense of the small States? Gentlemen have not shown. Have they considered that nothing is so fatal to freedom as the existence of orders and distinctions in society? Could the effect be less pernicious if you attempt with any effect to stir up rivalry of States? Are you prepared to estimate the consequences of violence and the conflict of weakness against strength? Can any gentleman reflect on it without horror? Is it to be presumed that if you set the furious passions in agitation, that the large States will sit patiently and bear unmerited reproach and outrage? Do you not perceive that these menaces and clamors proceed exclusively from those who affect so much concern for the small States? Are gentlemen aware of the responsibility which they attach to themselves—that of exciting resentment and animosity, and that kind of animosity which a weak man injured always feels towards the strong; for it is of no consequence whether the weak man is deceived and insulted by the imposition put upon him, if he is really deceived into the pernicious belief?

He had persuaded himself a mode of argument so pernicious could not be employed on this occasion; he had expected that the question would be examined and decided upon its true grounds. But beside this we find an attempt to defeat the amendment by its form. Let us examine this amendment. By filling up the blank with five, you carry the election into the House of Representatives; and why do we wish to keep the election out of the House of Representatives? Because experience teaches us to avoid the danger of diets, which are always exposed to intrigue and corruption, as we avoid elections by mobs, from their liability to be misled by the sudden impulse of passion and violence. We wish to avoid both, because each by different paths leads to the same consequence. One or two elections by a diet would repay the small States—with what? with monarchy. Elections by diets always lead to monarchy. It is for this reason, then, that we wish to keep the elections where they should be, in the hands of the people, where, from very obvious cause, neither intrigue nor corruption can operate. It is by diets that Great Britain has been ruined in her prosperity and liberties. By placing the election in the House of Representatives, you expose the small States to the evils which Great Britain has suffered through her rotten boroughs. The small number of Representatives in the small States will expose them to the allurements against which humanity is not always fortified. The danger of temptation must be guarded against, else the minority may be through corruption made to govern. The small boroughs where there are few electors have given the rule over the majority in England for more than a century; corruption has been the Prime Minister, and the Parliament has been in fact the mere registers of the monarchical edicts.

But it will be asked, do we lessen the chance by lessening the number? Yes, sir; the greater the scope is which you give the House of Representatives, your chance is the greater for a number of candidates; if you fill the blank with twenty, you will have twenty; if with five, you will have five within the scope of that power; and the greater numbers the electors may have to nominate, the greater division of sentiment, and more numerous will be the inducements to corruption.

Limit the number to three and you reduce the danger, and by condensing public sentiment, you will then have the watchfulness of ambition on one side and of virtue on the other, directed without distraction to the limited number; he would, therefore, prefer three to five.

MR. DAYTON believed it would come to this, that when the question came to be discussed, and the rights of the small States maintained, the large States would threaten us with their power. The same threats had been heard in the old Congress, but they were laughed at, for the votes of the States were equal; they were heard in the convention, but they were spurned at, for the votes were equal there also; the large States must be cautious here, for in this body, too, the votes are equal. The gentleman had talked of a classification of States as a novelty, but he would ask if that gentleman pretended to be wiser than the Constitution? Look through that instrument from beginning to end, and you will not find an article which is not founded on the presumption of a clashing of interests. Was this fine process instituted for nothing? Was developing the election in particular circumstances in the House of Representatives intended for nothing? Was nothing meant by the provision of the Constitution, that no amendment should ever deprive the States of the equality of votes in this House? Yet, it was that jealous caution which foresaw the necessity of guarding against the encroachments of large States. The States, whatever was their relative magnitude, were equal under the old Confederation, and the small States gave up a part of their rights as a compromise for a better form of government and security; but they cautiously preserved their equal rights in the Senate and in the choice of a Chief Magistrate. The same voice that now addresses you made the solemn claim, and declared there was no safety in association unless the small States were protected here. The warning was taken, and you find in that part, as in all others, a classification governs every line of the Constitution.

Mr. JACKSON said, that though coming from a small State he had not been instructed, and was therefore at perfect liberty to act according to the best of his judgment; though his State was now, in regard to population, small, and though it were to remain so, he could have but one opinion on this subject. He saw abundance of reason for preferring three to five. The Constitution under the present form has directed the choice to be made from five. But the reason of this was consistent with the result to be produced; the Electors were to vote for two persons indiscriminately, but with the restriction of voting for one only belonging to the State where the vote was given. The voting for two would necessarily bring forward four candidates, and a fifth possibly, for we saw in the two elections before the last that there was one more than the four, though in each case the fifth had but one vote; he alluded to the vote for Mr. Jay. In the amendment proposed you are called upon to designate for each office, and there can be little apprehension of having more than two or three principal candidates; and for twenty years to come he had no apprehension of a greater number of candidates if this amendment prevails.

Now, supposing that, as on the first and second elections, there were to be five candidates, and that there should be a candidate with one vote like Mr. Jay, and that the number were five; that there was an equal number of votes for two candidates as at the last election, two others with inferior numbers, and the fifth only with one vote, the election would devolve upon the House of Representatives, and thus would have them place him, who had only one vote, on the same footing with him who had seventy-three.

Suppose the result to be the same as the last election, when the votes were, for Thomas Jefferson 73, Aaron Burr 73, John Adams 65, C. C. Pinckney 64, J. Jay 1; here the unequal numbers would be placed under the power of the House upon equal terms.

What would you do, sir, if there was not barely five who had not the highest numbers?—your difficulties would increase with your numbers. He had no apprehensions on the score of the present election; every member of that House must be satisfied that there can be no doubt of his being the man of the people above all competition; he believed, too, he was the man of the Legislature. All considerations as to the next election could have no influence here; we must look to the future, when we may not be so fortunate. He was sorry to hear gentlemen talk of separate interests; he knew of no separate interests, but felt himself bound to maintain the interests of the great whole. This, he thought, could not be done but by the choice from the number three. You had best avoid the danger which experience has shown you narrowly escaped. You must keep the election out of the House of Representatives, if you wish to keep the Government from civil war, from the danger of having a man not voted for by the people proposed to be placed over your head, as you are plainly told had been proposed. We are but the servants of the people, and it is our duty to study their wishes. Separate interests do not exist; and the agitation of such ideas should not be countenanced. It is all a cant, a mere factious pretence; he had never known any separate or hostile interests in this country but that of Whig and Tory; though he had heard much less said about these real enemies than the imaginary adverse interests so much talked of as the Eastern and Southern States; then the Eastern and the Western; then come the federalists and anti-federalists; subsequently, federalism and republicanism; and now, it is the large and small States. Presently, he should not be surprised to hear of the hostility of the rats and anti-rats: the danger from one is as real as from the other. He hoped to see all this delusion banished; he was well satisfied it would not make any impression on the people. By fixing on the number three, division and passion will be more effectually prevented, and intrigue will have less room for operation.

Mr. WRIGHT.—We need not be told in this House, that the Constitution was the result of a compromise, or that care was taken to guard the rights of each State; these things we must be very ignorant, indeed, not to know. But does it therefore follow that it is not susceptible of amendment or correction under experience? Does it follow, because, for mutual interest and security, this compromise was made, that we are precluded from effecting any greater good? No man would accuse him of a wish to see the interest of any State impaired. But we can preserve the spirit and intention of the Constitution in full vigor, without impairing any interests. And this is to be done, by the discriminating principle; it fulfills the intention, and it forebids the recurrence of that danger from which you have once escaped. By this principle, each elector may name his man for each office, and this can be done whether the number be three or five. For the latter number he was disposed, because already adopted by the other House, and he did not wish to delay its progress. If we were to form a constitution, he would provide that there should be only two candidates presented to the House. But he did not rely on any number so much as on the discriminating principle.

MR. NICHOLAS.—Several gentlemen profess much reluctance to make any change in the Constitution; he would make no such profession; and though he should be as jealous of improper alterations, or the introduction of principles incompatible with Republican Government, he would not hesitate to make any alteration calculated to promote, or secure the public liberty upon a firmer basis; nay, if it could be made better he would expunge the whole book. Gentlemen who are for adhering so closely to the Constitution, appear not to consider that a choice of President from the number three, is more in the spirit of the Constitution than from five; and preserves the relation that the election of two persons, under the present form, holds to the number five. A reason equally forcible with him was, that, by taking the number three instead of five, you place the choice with more certainty in the people at large, and render the choice more consonant to their wishes. With him, also, it was a most powerful reason for preferring three, that it would render the Chief Magistrate dependent only on the people at large, and independent of any party or any State interest. The people hold the sovereign power, and it was intended by the Constitution that they should have the election of the Chief Magistrate. It was never contemplated as a case likely to occur, but in an extreme case, that the election should go to the House of Representatives. What, he asked, would have been the effect, had Mr. Jay been elected when he had only one vote? What, he would ask, would be the impression made upon our own people, and upon foreign nations, had Mr. Aaron Burr been chosen at the last election, when the universal sentiment was to place the present Chief Magistrate in that station? He did not mean anything disrespectful or invidious towards the Vice President, he barely stated the fact, so well known, and asked, what would be the effect? Where would be the bond of attachment to that Constitution which could admit of an investiture in a case so important, in known opposition to the wishes of the people? The effect would be fatal to the Constitution itself; it would weaken public attachment to it, and the affection, if alone for the small States, would not have been heard of in the deep murmur of discontent. Gentlemen, who pretended to feel, for he would not enter into their conceptions, if they had any real apprehensions on the subject of the danger of the smaller States, forget that this is not a project of the large States; they ought to have considered that it has originated with the small States; and that, in the House of Representatives, two-thirds of the representation is that of the smaller States. Have gentlemen forgotten that the amendment has been twice recommended from South Carolina, afterwards by Vermont, then by New Hampshire, and finally by Tennessee? Are these large or small States? Away with such groundless pretences! The attempt to excite jealousy in the small States cannot succeed. The people know that it is calculated to prevent a crisis which was long apprehended, and which the experience of the last election proved to be well founded.

MR. MACLAY said, he believed that, as it concerned one more than another State, it was perfectly immaterial whether the number five or three were chosen. He conceived that it involved no question but what was common to all the States; and he wished this clannish spirit could be laid aside on occasions of this important nature; and that the general interest of the whole should be considered. In this point of view, the present amendment cannot affect the political rights of any State, for, being on a perfect equality, in the choice of one from three as well as one from five, no danger of rights can exist, though other dangers may be apprehended. If any rights can be at all affected, they must be civil rights. But here he found it difficult to convey, with the clearness he could wish, his ideas on the application of the amendment to civil rights; he would, therefore, endeavor to do that by comparison, which was not so easily explained by itself. He would compare the States of the Union, in their collective capacity, to individuals in society; wealth, in society, is power; and he who has wealth possesses a more extensive influence than he who is poor; in this respect, perhaps it may be said, they are not upon a perfect equality, because one man possesses an equal direct power with the poor man, and an overplus of indirect power, which the poor man does not possess. But the same men, in their civil capacity as citizens, are upon complete terms of equality, possessing equal rights and power, as in the right of suffrage, and in the sight of the law, they are equally units in the mass of society.

Extent of territory, occupied by a numerous population, is, in a State, what wealth is to the private individual. The State of small extent, or of comparatively small population, stands in the same relation to society as the poor man. Notwithstanding this disparity of political or physical power, the rich and the poor man, the large and the small State, are equally interested in supporting their actual or personal rights. But they may be considered as equally interested in supporting those personal rights which connect themselves with the security of their wealth, in which they have but unequal interest. The wealthy have, besides their civil rights, their property at stake, and may therefore be supposed more vigilant and watchful of innovations which might weaken or destroy that security by which they hold their rights and privileges. If this reasoning be correct, let us apply it to the case under consideration; why attempt to alarm and raise jealousies in the small States, when it is evident that the interest of the large States will be constant protection to the smaller States? The idea might be carried farther, and it might be shown that, if there is anything in this amendment that has any tendency to alter the relative power and influence of any States in the Union, the danger would be to every State, in proportion to its extent and population.

It was probable, that on this subject he entertained opinions different from gentlemen whose talents and information he highly respected; on such occasions he always offered his sentiments with diffidence, and he was willing to hear and be convinced if mistaken; but from every view he had taken of the amendment, it did not appear to him that it could alter the principle in the Constitution, nor change in any way the relative rights and situation of the States. In simple truth, it is only alteration in the detail of the elective process, calculated to assimilate the election of President and Vice President of the United States to the modes already in practice in the election of the Executive of several of the States. He could not see that it would be attended with any danger to any of the States; if there was danger, the danger would be greater to the larger States, as their interest is the greatest. But danger of this kind cannot and does not exist; for it cannot be shown that this amendment has or can produce any effect on the law-making power in this country, and it is in this power that we are to seek for the nature and the protection of all our rights, civil and political; and, with this impression, he would vote for the amendment with the number three.

An adjournment was now called for and carried.

FRIDAY, November 25.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee on the 23d instant to the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States;" and having amended the report, it was adopted: and the bill passed to a third reading as amended.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The treaty with the Kaskaskia Indians being ratified with the advice and consent of the Senate, it is now laid before both Houses in their Legislative capacity. It will inform them of the obligations which the United States thereby contract, and particularly that of taking the tribe under their future protection; and that the ceded country is submitted to their immediate possession and disposal.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion, by Mr. ADAMS, that it be

Resolved, That a committee of — members be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further measures may be necessary for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and the French Republic, concluded at Paris on the 30th April, 1803, whereby Louisiana was ceded to the United States; which committee may report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. COCKE had leave to bring in a bill to make further appropriations for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee appointed to consider the amendment proposed to the Constitution, in the mode of electing the President and Vice President.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the amendment, adopted yesterday, and strike out the words "in the manner directed by the Constitution," and insert:

"But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice."

On motion, it was agreed to amend the amendment adopted yesterday, and to strike out the words, "and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution," and insert:

"If such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President. A quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice."

On motion, by one of the majority, it was agreed to consider the vote of yesterday for inserting the word "three" in line tenth of the amendment agreed to, so that it stand blank; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, November 28.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Postmaster General, with his annual report, made conformably to law; and they were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

On motion,

"That a committee of — members be appointed to prepare a form or forms of government for the Territory of Louisiana."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, addition may be necessary to the Naval Armament of the United States, and whether it would be proper to authorize the President to dispose of any of the public ships of war now in the service of the United States, and to report by bill or otherwise."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d instant, the bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," reported the bill with amendments.

Ordered That they lie for consideration.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee appointed to consider the amendment proposed to the Constitution, in the mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS suggested the propriety of postponing the question this day, as a member was absent indisposed, (Mr. ANDERSON,) who was the representative of a small State. He was ready on Saturday to give his vote on the main question and on the incidental question; but as he understood the number three to be a sine qua non with the gentleman from Virginia, he thought it better the subject should be postponed until the House should be full.

Mr. COCKE said, that number was not with him a sine qua non; he would vote for the amendment with either number; though, from a more deliberate consideration of the arguments he had heard, he was disposed to think three the best number, as it promised to bring the election closer to the people. He was not apprized how his colleague meant to vote.

Mr. FRANKLIN was against a postponement. His mind was perfectly made up on the subject, and it was time the Senate should come to a decision. The Legislature of his State was in session; their sentiments were decidedly in favor of the amendment, and he wished it to reach them before Christmas, as they would most likely rise about that time.

Mr. WHITE said that he, as well as other gentlemen, was ready to vote on the main and incidental questions, and was fully aware of the importance of an early decision. His mind was made up, as a member from a small State, for the number five, and he understood that the member absent was in favor of the same number. He wished, on his account, therefore, to postpone, though ready himself. The gentleman might be able to attend to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought there was no necessity whatever to delay a decision. If the indisposition of a member was a good reason for delay, business might be postponed forever; but even if the gentleman absent was solicitous to deliver his sentiments, the filling up the blank with any number need not prevent it, as the number might be withdrawn to afford him that opportunity, and the discussion of the main question might still proceed.

Mr. DAYTON was opposed to that mode of proceeding. Upon the issue of the number five or three, it was probable that the whole question would depend.

Mr. TRACY was for a postponement. He felt himself unwell.

Mr. COCKE was indifferent; whether decided now or to-morrow, it would be the same. Postponed.

TUESDAY, November 29.

Mr. BRADLEY presented the petition of Elijah Brainard, stating that he had received a wound in the service of the United States during the late Revolutionary war, and that he is thereby reduced to great distress, and wholly incapacitated for bodily labor, and praying admission on the pension list, although his claim may be barred by the statute of limitations; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I now communicate an appendix to the information heretofore given on the subject of Louisiana. You will be sensible, from the face of these papers, as well as of those to which they are a sequel, that they are not, and could not, be official, but are furnished by different individuals, as the result of the best inquiries they had been able to make, and now given as received from them, only digested under heads to prevent repetitions.

TH. JEFFERSON.

NOVEMBER 29, 1803

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill entitled "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,'" was read the second time.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be the order of the day for to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The order of the day being called up on the amendments to the Constitution—a considerable time elapsed, when

Mr. DAYTON rose and said, that since no other gentleman thought proper to address the Chair, although laboring himself under a very severe cold, which rendered speaking painful, he could not suffer the question to pass without an effort to arrest it in its progress; and should consider his last breath well expended in endeavoring to prevent the degradation which the State he represented would suffer if the amendment were to prevail.

As to the question immediately before the Senate for filling the blank with five, he felt himself indebted to the member from Tennessee for renewing the subject. He was grateful, also, to the member from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) for declaring he would support it, as well as for giving the assurance that he was disposed to consider and spare the interests of the small States as far as possible, consistently with the great object of discrimination.

Every member who had spoken on this subject seemed to have admitted, by the very course and pointing of their arguments, even though they may have denied it in words, that this was really a question between great and small States, and disguise it as they would the question would be so considered out of doors. The privilege given by the Constitution extended to five, out of which the choice of President should be made; and why should the smaller, for whose benefit and security that number was given, now wantonly throw it away without an equivalent? As to the Vice President, his election had no influence upon the number, because the choice of President in the House of Representatives was as free and unqualified as if that subordinate office did not exist. Nay, he said, he would venture to assert that, even if the number five were continued, and the Vice Presidency entirely abolished, there would not be as great a latitude of choice as under the present mode, because those five out of whom the choice must eventually be made, were much more likely hereafter to be nominated by the great States, inasmuch as their electors would no longer be compelled to vote for a man of a different State. The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has said, he was not surprised that those who had seats in the old Congress, should perplex themselves with the distinctions; but he could tell that gentleman, that it was not in the old Congress he had learnt them, for there he had seen all the votes of the States equal, and had known the comparatively little State of Maryland controlling the will of the Ancient Dominion. It was in the Federal Convention that distinction was made and acknowledged; and he defied that member to do, what had been before requested of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, viz: to open the Constitution, and point out a single article, if he could, that had not evidently been framed upon a presumption of diversity (he had almost said, adversity) of interest between the great and small States.

The gentleman from Georgia, too, (Mr. JACKSON,) is very much afflicted that the State distinctions had been introduced on the occasion, and admonished the Senate to put away all local considerations. That gentleman may now be prepared to do so, since he has obtained all his heart could wish for his immediate constituents; but if there was a single member who had more ably, more perseveringly, and more successfully and warmly contended for the rights and interests of his particular State, than any or all the other members on that floor, he was that member. The gentleman had not only been quickly, but tremblingly alive to every measure that could in the most distant degree affect the interests of his State. It would be remembered that in the session before last, when a bill came up from the other House for allowing the privilege of franking a few letters to a gentleman who sat there as delegate, and had travelled about thirteen hundred miles from the banks of the Mississippi to inform us that it was inhabited by other creatures than alligators, the bill was opposed by that very gentleman, upon the ground that the dignity of Georgia would be wounded, and her rights injured by the passage of that bill. It was afterwards committed and recommitted, whilst the unhappy delegate (since put in his grave, poor man! no doubt of a broken heart) was compelled to wait several weeks without writing under privilege and without drawing a shilling of money, until the gentleman from Georgia could find leisure to secure the rights and dignity of his State from being injured by allowing the delegate to frank his billets.

In a more recent and far more important transaction, it might be recollected also, how dexterously, how zealously, and how very successfully he advocated the interests of a little corner of the Union known by the name of Georgia. On the list of expenditures there would hereafter be seen between one and two millions accounted for by being paid over to the treasury of the State he represents, as the fair fruits of his zeal and address. He may now be ready, since he has obtained thus the extent of his wishes, to banish all local attachments pending this question. He would give him credit for his assertion, and for two reasons: first, because the gentleman himself had said so; and next, because he should, on any other principle, be at a loss to account for the vote he was about to give.

Since these instances of State attachment, and of the good fruits of it, were so fresh in the recollection of the Senate, it was to be hoped the gentleman from Georgia would allow members from other States, sometimes, to imitate his commendable example, by taking a little care of the interests of their constituents—not in the more trivial question of franking letters or of a few dirty acres, but in a question so very serious in its nature as to strike at their sovereignty itself.

Some attention was due to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MACLAY,) who went into an ingenious but subtle distinction between civil and political rights, artfully calculated to divert the attention of the Senate from the true distinction upon which this motion and the main question turned, by amusing them with an ingenious disquisition on the rights of men in society, distinguishing them under the heads of political and civil. But without following him through his regular chain of reasoning, he would make shorter work, and reduce all that gentlemen had said to the test of analysis. To those Representatives of small States who should vote with him, his disquisition was intended doubtless as a sort of justification; and to those of them who, although voting against him, must be compelled to submit, it was kindly meant as a consolation under the new dispensation of State influence. They were told that their rights were of two kinds, viz: political, in relation to their standing as members of a State, and civil in reference to their rights as mere individuals; that their political rights might be abolished or abridged, or their State sovereignties invaded and prostrated, but their civil rights might remain unimpaired; that they might, to be sure, be less respected as Jerseymen, Rhode Islanders, or Georgians, but they would not therefore be less respected and regarded as members of the Union, or Americans. Mr. D. said he liked the gentleman's illustration of his argument much better than the argument itself; and he approved the machinery he had employed much more than the use he had made of it. With his leave, therefore, he would take the materials he had furnished for the occasion, and put them into plain and simple allegory.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had compared the great and small States confederated, to rich and poor men associated in one community. Let the comparison for argument's sake, be admitted to be just, and let the analogy be pursued. Suppose these rich men, four in number, and the poor men thirteen, had entered into a compact which required that a chief should be chosen from among them once in four years, and that, as their votes would be in proportion to their wealth, the four men would have a preponderance over the other thirteen. Suppose them allowed to vote for themselves exclusively, but with this stipulation, that if, on the first ballot, a majority should be found for one, it should devolve upon the whole seventeen to decide upon a chief, with equal voices; would it not in this case be the interest of these four to limit the choice to the three highest on the list, and of the thirteen to extend it to five? In the first case of three, they would be compelled to elect one of the three rich, however unworthy; and in the other case, they would be at liberty to choose one of their own number, if they thought him better qualified than any of the other four. They might, it was true, risk the displeasure of the four rich men, but why debar themselves from doing it, if the case should justify their running the risk? This could with propriety be said to be such a case, or, to drop all figure, a question between the great and small States. The Constitution allowed a choice from the five highest on the list, and why should we debar ourselves of the right of such a choice? It was a privilege which ought to be persisted in, even though the resentment of the great States might be aroused. As expressed in the animated language of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, "their power was great, and he could hear the menace of a former day reverberating through the Senate Chamber;" its effects would perhaps be best ascertained by the vote which was to follow.

Mr. WRIGHT rose only to correct an error into which the gentleman from New Jersey had fallen, concerning the number five, which he had spoken in favor of on a former day; he had never admitted nor argued that the number five or three would affect the Constitution or the small States; he had, on the contrary, declared that all he wanted was the discriminating principle; and so that was effected, he cared not whether the choice was to be made from five or from twenty. As he had not used such arguments, he supposed he must have been imposed upon, by the misrepresentation of his sentiments in an infamous paper, called the Washington Federalist, in which nothing said on his side of the House was reported truly; that paper had falsified his speech, and he took that opportunity to state that, whosoever was the reporter of his speech in that paper, was guilty of a lie.

Mr. DAYTON observed that the allusion he had made was to the support which the gentleman certainly gave to the number five; as to what the paper alluded to might say, he had nothing to answer.

Mr. WRIGHT had repeatedly advocated the discriminating principle, and he had been represented as holding opinions which he did not hold, that the amendment was an attack on the small States; now, as he had never entertained that opinion, and as that infamous paper had so misrepresented him, he must repeat, that whoever wrote that charge in that paper, wrote a lie.

Mr. DAYTON hoped the gentleman did not mean to connect him in his observations; he could not certainly suspect him as the author of any piece in that paper.

Mr. COCKE had also come in for a share of the gentleman's thanks, but there were none due, as he had acted as one of the majority, and was willing by giving them an opportunity to say all they had to say in favor of the number five. With him, at first, it was a matter of indifference, so he obtained the discriminating principle. His constituents were unanimous in favor of this principle, and he had their instructions to that effect. He preferred the number three for the reasons he had already given; it brought the election closer to the people; five would give a greater latitude, and subject it to the Legislature, which he did not wish to see take place. As to those dreadful consequences, and all this depredation of States, he could not see how those things could happen. What if the larger States were foolish enough to attempt the enslavement of the smaller States, were the small States so feeble and so few as not to be able to prevent them? As to this degradation of small States, he could recollect the time when it was said that if Pennsylvania would give an unanimous vote, New Jersey would give a vote to counteract it. He knew nothing that would degrade a State so much as intrigues of such a nature; and, it was to avoid that degradation, he wished for the amendment. He wished the President not to be an intriguer; he wished to have him what he now is, the man of the people; and, for that purpose, he would vote for three.

Mr. JACKSON had intended to have given only a naked vote on this question, but the profusion of compliments heaped upon him for merely discharging his duty, demanded some return; he had been sent to that body to watch the interests of his State, and to do, to the best of his judgment, justice between it and the United States. He had conceived the rights of Georgia invaded, and he felt it to be his duty to seek justice according to the Constitution. Whatever gentlemen may insinuate about dirty acres, no! State of the Union was so much oppressed as Georgia had been; not by the large States, from which the gentleman apprehends so much, but by the small. Let any gentleman consult the Convention at New York, and they will find that not a single small State came forward to support her protest against a great wrong when a treaty was sanctioned that violated her rights and parcelled out her territory. As well might the Union pretend to give up Philadelphia to Great Britain, as the county of Talassee to a parcel of tomahawking Indians. Had that gentleman been a Representative no doubt he would have come down upon them in thunder, he would have with a loud voice rent the Hall of Congress with the wrongs of the State, and the ravage and carnage to which it was exposed; he would have described the children torn from their mothers' arms by the unfeeling savage, and dashed to pieces; the matron abused and murdered; and deplored that, to the authors of such cruelties, the territory had been consigned.

Gentlemen either knew not or cared not for these wrongs; and, after several years supplication, it was only two years ago that half justice was done; for half what was taken away by usurpation, has not been restored by justice. We had paid other States for defending the Union, but Georgia had not yet been paid, and it remains yet to be known, whether the widow, bereaved of her husband in battle, or murdered by treachery, while defending his country, or the orphan who survived her murdered parents, are to be remunerated even for their country and equitable demands. Government by a law seized upon this territory and legislated for it. It was for that territory a Delegate was sent, to whom the gentleman advertised. He opposed the extension of the privilege of franking to any Delegate, because agreeing to it would be to acknowledge the title of injustice.

No State had ever been oppressed by Georgia; year after year they had sent petitions demanding payment for the service of the militia which had protected the frontiers, but they had not been paid to this hour.

Upon the merits of the question of numbers, he had wished to remain silent, but, as he was up, he would intrude upon the House a few observations. He preferred the number three, for several serious reasons; he wished to prevent the choice from devolving upon the House of Representatives; he wished it to be out of their power, if it should devolve upon them, to elect any man not evidently intended by the people; the smaller number would render this more certain; he did not consider it a matter of any consequence from what State a President was chosen; he believed the small States had never offered a candidate; the period was too short, since the existence of the Government to admit of many States having an opportunity to bring forward a candidate; and various good causes had contributed to make the selections that had been from large States. While parties existed there would be a champion chosen by each; if New Jersey has not brought forward one, it cannot be for want of inclination; and where Princeton College exists it would be ungracious to suppose that the requisite talents could not be found there. Georgia had never wished to bring forward a candidate, neither had Tennessee, nor several other States. He believed that wherever a man should be found in the Union distinguished by his virtues, his genius, and his devotion to republican principles, that he would be taken up, without concern for the State in which he has his residence.

This league of the large States, so much harped upon, he could not comprehend; where was it to be formed, and how? Are we certain that Massachusetts and Virginia, Pennsylvania and New York, will, notwithstanding their distance, several interests, and views, combine to tie the small States, hands and feet? No, sir, we find the large States disagreeing and as jealous of each other as the small; and with more reason, if the argument has any weight at all.

He preferred the number three in the amendment, as it brought the election two degrees nearer to the people; because a Constitution was not intended for the convenience of the servants, but for the use of the Sovereign—the people. Out of five persons the provision for a choice was before directed to be made; the Constitution as now proposed to be altered would approach to the principle and number of five in a safer and more certain way, for the President would be chosen out of the three highest, and the Vice President out of two others. It was not proper that any man should have a chance of being placed in a situation of so much consequence, contrary to the intention of the people. It is, therefore, our duty to prevent such an occurrence; and we ought to send our amendment to the people as free from defects as possible, because their rights are involved therein; neglect their rights, and they will form a Constitution for themselves; or, in seeking to reform it, they will incur the dangers, either of a sanguinary revolution, or of the establishment of a Government like that of Great Britain, sustained by corruption and wretchedness of the people.

Mr. TAYLOR would trespass on the House with a few observations. With other gentlemen, he was not so much disposed to dispute about the number five or three, as strenuous to obtain the principle of designation. The argument of those who opposed the amendment, he perceived, had been all along founded on extreme cases, which, even if they were to happen, would not produce the affirmed effects on the small States. The number three he certainly preferred, because it gave a greater certainty to popular choice; the extreme case of this would be an election by the House of Representatives; if the number were three, how would this operate in the House? Would not the small States have a greater share of influence than the large States, in the proportion of thirteen to four? Another case is, that election should remain in the divisible electoral bodies, as heretofore, or, in the extreme, be elected by an accumulated body in the House of Representatives.

Would this latter be in favor of the small States? Would the election by a Diet be preferable or safer than the choice by Electors in various places so remote as to be out of the scope of each other's influence, and so numerous as not to be accessible by corruption? It is true, that the number three has a greater tendency to give the choice to the people; it cannot be true that the small States would wish to place it in the House of Representatives, because three would give the people the choice; and, even if they did wish to take the choice out of the hands of the people, it ought to be opposed, because it is contrary to the spirit and intent of the Constitution.

The division of election is one of the soundest principles of the Constitution; elections are more free and less liable to passion and corruption in the state of division; for experience has shown that elections, any more than Executive powers, cannot be so well effected by accumulative bodies. Your Constitution directs elections in States, not assembled in one place. And why? To prevent the evils to which Diets or Legislative bodies are exposed. Does not three, then, adhere infinitely more to the leading principle of your Constitution, by placing it in the power of the numerous election districts, and keeping out of the reach of the numerous or accumulated body the choice? Is it not necessary to guard, by every means, against what has proved fatal to so many Republics?

Let the extreme cases, on the other hand, be taken. The number five is adopted. For what end? To carry the election to the House of Representatives; will the small States be benefited by five more than three? Will they not, from the number, be more likely to be divided; and would not a number of the large States then possess all the advantages of number and union? For the gentlemen consider this union of the large States as certain, and they cannot refuse their own arguments, or the consequences of them.

Suppose the elective power of the people annihilated, and transferred solely to the Legislature? Would the small States consent to this? Would they be so blind? Yet, by adopting five, you promote this evil; by three you prevent it. And yet gentlemen say they look upon this as only a contest of small and large States.

The gentleman from New Jersey had talked something of a threat, alleged to have been thrown out in that House, by him in a former day's debate. He would beg leave to say, that the gentleman had most egregiously misrepresented or misconstrued him. But he could see in it a very shallow stratagem; he thought the gentleman possessed more skill; had his generalship been as great as his reputation he would not have planted his ambuscade where the enemy must see him from all sides, and expose all his force by this state of his advance party. When he heard this clamor about the danger of small States, he was led to ask, what was their number? And, looking round that House, he found that there were thirteen represented, and only four large States! Are the Representatives of the small States in this Senate, then, so blind to their danger, that, possessed of a full majority of nine States, they will deny themselves the power of self-government? It is a principle of heroism, or something else, which enables minorities to govern; but it is a principle of reason and virtue, which gives the Government to majorities in a free Government. Are we, then, in making the designating principle, to adhere to the form and desert the substance? How does the Constitution now stand? We choose from five the President and Vice President. How, if we adopt three? Then the President would be chosen from three, and the Vice President from two—making five. Here preserving the substance, and indirectly the form. How, if we adopt the designating principle, and leave the number five? Then, we would choose the President from the five, and the Vice President from two other—making seven! The more the subject is examined the more we must be convinced that three should have the preference.

Before he sat down he would say a word more on the subject of the threat alleged to have come from the Ancient Dominion. If he mistook not there were intimations held out in the course of the debate, that bloodshed would be the result of the amendment of the Constitution; and many other expressions of that nature had been employed, which by no means argued decorum, and could not serve as argument with any member of that House. The malignant passion of jealousy was conjured up, to be the herald of this civil discord, and the most disastrous afflictions were predicted as the consequence. In glancing at these unwarranted and unwarrantable sentiments, he had assumed it as a principle not to be overthrown, that free governments must exist upon moral rectitude, or perish; and that if the United States were capable of being actuated to rage by their pernicious and destructive passions, rectitude and morality would no longer exist among them, and they must be destroyed by each other. What, sir, because there are strong and powerful States, must the weak be tolerated to menace them with injury and bloodshed, without the liberty of warring against the fatal consequences? Are strong men bound to bear the wrongs done them by the weak? Are the rich to fold their arms and bear to be robbed by the poor with silence, and without remonstrance? Yet such is the inference that must be made from what the gentleman has undertaken to call a threat. Wherefore threaten with good? Can evil be the result of good, or good of evil? Natural and moral consequences flow from moral actions; and when there are any who undertake to do evil, it is but strict justice he should suffer. He found some difficulty in bringing himself to notice this charge of a threat, because he had perceived, particularly in the paper published in this city, a common practice of misrepresentation. In a former day's debate he had alluded to the fatal effects which the British Government had produced on the liberty and prosperity of that country, by the means of the rotten boroughs; and he had been misrepresented as depreciating the small States and describing them as the rotten boroughs of America. It must be obvious that a purposed intention to misrepresent could alone have given sentiments of the kind as uttered by him. He had not alluded to the States in their capacity as States; he had objected to elections by diets, and the small States having but few representatives, he stated as more exposed to corrupt attempts upon them, than States where the number was larger. In an election by the House of Representatives this would be the case: some States have but one, others two representatives, attempts would be made upon them, and though we have had virtue enough to resist temptation, our country must be like all others subject to the casual decay of virtue, and at a future day the representatives of small States may become as venal as those of the rotten boroughs of England; and no longer represent the feelings, the interests, or the freedom of their country.

Mr. ADAMS in a former debate had stated that he had not a wish to avoid or seek for the yeas and nays on any question; on the present occasion, however, he would, when the question was taken, call for the yeas and nays. But his own vote on the final question would be governed by the decision of the number five, and he wished to have some record of his vote, that he might be hereafter able to defend himself against any charge of inconsistency. On the principle of the amendment he had formed his opinion, and he was free to confess, that notwithstanding the many able productions which he had seen against it, he thought it calculated to produce more good than evil. He was not however influenced in this opinion by the instructions which had been read in a preceding debate from a former Legislature of Massachusetts to their Senators; he presumed these were not read by way of intimidation. To the instructions of those to whom he owed his seat in that House he would pay every respect that was due, but he did not think that the resolutions of a Legislature passed in March 1799 or 1800 ought to have the same weight. Since that time four total and complete changes had taken place, and probably not one third of those who gave those instructions now remained. He held a seat in the Legislature himself three years since, but did not perceive any particular anxiety on the subject, and he did not think that the present Legislature would be extremely offended if he were to give a direct vote against what was recommended four years ago. But as it seemed to be read to influence him he would state his reasons for his vote.

Upon the alteration of the number from that agreed upon by the House of Representatives several arguments had been offered; they were of three descriptions.

1. That no alteration of the Constitution ought to take place unless it should be indispensably necessary, and that in altering the Constitution no departure should be made from its spirit.

2. That it ought not to be carried in the House of Representatives.

3. That the alteration proposed would affect the small States.

To the first he would say that although the amendment might be useful, yet it was not necessary.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. BUTLER) had argued on the necessity of adhering to the principles of the Constitution on a former day with great force; and though his arguments were used upon an amendment of another kind proposed by himself they applied in this case as closely as possible; the same arguments had been used by other gentlemen, on a suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) concerning the abolition of the office of Vice President. It is true that some gentlemen declared that they had no objection to the abolition, but disapproved of the time it was brought forward; he agreed and voted with the gentleman on that occasion.

But the ground is now changed and we are told that the principle of designation is not so much the choice as to keep the election out of the House of Representatives, and in a variety of ingenious arguments we are referred back to antiquity to justify the injurious effect resulting from elections by diets. As a speculation upon the principles of government he admired the gentleman's information and eloquence, but he was not prepared to act upon the principle. We had been shown the great inconveniences of carrying the elections into the House of Representatives; make it a separate question, and let it be fairly and fully discussed and he would then prepare his mind to vote. But before he could act on it now, he would just observe, that if you do not pursue that course you pursue some other, and it would be necessary to provide a substitute before we abandon that we possess. This consideration he therefore thought had no concern with the subject before us.

On the third point, that it would essentially affect the rights of the small States, he thought it the true object of discussion; and he saw it wholly as a federative question, and rejected all arguments of the popular kind. From the mode in which it had been argued the question would seem to be a dispute between sixteen small, and one large State. The Constitution however was a combination of federative and popular principles. When you argue upon, or wish to change any of its federative principles, you must use analogies as arguments; popular arguments will not apply to federative principles. The House of Representatives was founded on popular principles; in this House the representation is federative, and not popular, it is in its nature aristocratic. The foundation of all popular representation is equality of votes; but even the ratio of representation is different in different States; the numbers in Massachusetts and Virginia, in Vermont and Delaware, are different in their proportions; but still an equality of representation is preserved, and the only difference is in the details. But if you argue upon the principles of the Senate, this equality of popular representation, or by an equal or relatively equal number, will not apply; you must discuss it upon another species of equality, of sovereignties, and the independence of several States federatively connected. Applying principles then to the election of President, if you reduce the number from which the House of Representatives is authorized to choose, do you not attack the principles of the federal compact, rather than the rights of the small States? The Executive, it had been said, is the man of the people; true, and he is also, as was said, though upon different grounds, the man of the Legislature—it was here a combined principle, federative and popular. Virginia had in that House twenty-two popular representatives, in this she has two federative; Delaware has one popular and two federative representatives. And even in the operation of election in the popular branch of Congress, the federative principle is pursued, and the State which has only one popular representative has an equal voice in that instance with the State that has twenty-two popular representatives. It was therefore evident that the attempt to alter the number from five to three, is an attack upon the federative principle, and not upon the small States.

In answer to the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had said he was not surprised to hear him who was a member of the old Confederation talk of the jealousy of States, and expressed much exultation that those State jealousies had been long laid asleep; that he had been ten years in the Government and had heard nothing of them; hoped never to hear of them again. He was equally happy that they had been so long laid asleep; but why was it that they had not complained? For very different reasons from those which had been inferred. It was because the excellent provisions of the Constitution had guarded against all cause of complaint. The States had no reason to murmur, and they had not been stirred up; but is it to be therefore inferred that if you now give them cause, that they will be equally silent, and that it may not tend to civil discord? He knew of nothing more likely to stir them up than an attempt to reform your federative institutions upon popular principles.

The gentleman from Virginia, as he understood him the other day, had intimated that the smaller States ought to be cautious how they excited the indignation of the large States; on this account he had complained that the gentleman from New Jersey had misrepresented him. From the illustration of his statements now given he was persuaded that no threat was intended on that occasion; but as that impression was made, it surely was incumbent on those who felt it to notice it. Was it unnatural for a gentleman coming from a comparatively small State to feel indignant under such a circumstance? The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) is so ingenious, that, like all ingenious men, his sentiments are not at once accessible to plain minds, and to this cause misapprehension ought to be attributed.

Another gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) had said that the amendment had originated with the small States; that the small States having a majority in this House and a majority of the Legislatures, may defeat it if they choose; and these are with him decisive as to safety. But the gentleman has not taken into view that this question of number has never been before the States, and that having had no opportunity to examine it, the arguments do not apply. It is by this principle his own vote should be regulated; if three were adopted, he should vote against the amendment.

But the gentleman (Mr. TAYLOR) had taken another novel ground—that the smaller number was the most favorable to the small States. This, however, he supported by a mode of argument to which he had himself objected. He had argued that if it was proposed to vest the election of President in the House of Representatives exclusively, it would not be agreed to by the small States, because it was contrary to their interests. But this was an extreme case, and the gentleman well knew that, so far from its being consistent with sound logic, to argue from extreme cases, they are not admitted into argument at all.

Mr. S. SMITH, when he made the motion for filling up the blank with three, did it after the most deliberate consideration of the theory and the principles of the Constitution; which, if he understood it right, intended that the election of the Executive should be in the people, or as nearly as was possible, consistent with public order and security to the right of suffrage. The provision admitting the choice by the House of Representatives, was itself intended only for an extreme case, where great inconvenience might result from sending a defective election back to the people, as is customary in Massachusetts, where, if the majority is deficient, a new election is required. Our object in the amendment is or should be to make the election more certain by the people. This was to be done most effectually by leaving it to them to designate the persons whom they preferred for each office. As under the present form there was an extreme case, so there might be when the change of number should take place; for, although even with the number three, there was a possibility of the choice devolving on the House of Representatives, yet the adoption of the designating principle and the number three, would render the case less probable. It never was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the election should go to the House of Representatives but in the extreme case; nor was it ever contemplated that about one-fifth of the people should choose a President for the rest, which certainly would be the case if what some gentlemen contended for were to take place. When gentlemen contend for such a power as would transfer the choice from the people, and place it in the hands of a minority so small, how happens it that gentlemen will not bear to hear of the efforts which such arguments or such measures would produce on the large States? It was not the interest of the small States to combine against the large. Suppose it were possible that the four large States should combine—and a combination of the small States alone could produce such an effect—nine States in the Union have but thirty-two votes out of one hundred and forty-two, yet nine States, with one vote each, make a majority of seventeen, though in relation to population they contain only about one-fifth of the whole; and by such a proceeding the one-fifth might choose a President and Vice President in defiance of the other four-fifths. What would be the consequence of such an election? At a subsequent election the large States would combine, and by the use of their votes they would frustrate every object which the small States might use their efforts to accomplish.

Notwithstanding what had been said concerning the jealousy of States, he could see nothing in it but the leaven of the old Congress, thrown in to work up feelings that had been long still. It was the forlorn hope, the last stratagem of party; and he was the more disposed to think so, when he saw gentlemen from the large States coming forward as the champions of the small—this might be sure, be magnanimity; but if his discernment did not deceive him, it was a stratagem to divide the friends of the amendment. Why was not the same jealousy entertained of the power of thirteen out of seventeen combining and giving absolute law to the other four? Why have gentlemen paid no regard to the experience which they have had from the last election, when less than one third of the members harassed the public mind, kept the Union in agitation, and Congress engrossed to the exclusion of nearly all other business for two weeks? Suppose that the House had been as accessible to corruption as the diets of other nations have been, and that three men, having in their power the votes of three States, had been seized upon, and the election made contrary to the wishes of the people. What would be the effect—on the minds of the people—on the administration of the Government—and on the attachment which the people feel for the Constitution itself? He need not attempt to describe the effects. But it is our duty to prevent the return of such dangers, by keeping the election out of that House. And the most effectual mode is to fix the selection from the number three.

The gentleman from New Jersey had affected to consider a comparison of the effects of combinations of States, as a threat against the small States. He had listened as he always did to the ingenious arguments of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR;) he thought he had attended to his arguments with particular attention on that occasion, because they carried to his mind that conviction which truth always carries couched in the language of sincerity. To him, the gentleman's observations on that day conveyed the same ideas and convictions which his explanations conveyed this day in a more copious way, but to him it appeared impossible; and if he had not heard the gentleman from New Jersey, (he confessed with astonishment,) he could not have believed it practicable to give any coloring of menace to his arguments. The gentleman from New Jersey had censured the gentleman from Georgia for his attention to the State which he represented; but what bearing had the gentleman's discharge of his duty to his State on the present question? The gentleman from Georgia had not taken up the present question on the narrow ground of a selfish, jealous, and illiberal policy, but upon great national principles. It was the practice of that gentleman to act; it was his practice to discharge his duty with fidelity to his State and to his country at large, and such conduct reflected honor on him.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) says we had forgot the main object; that we changed our ground; and that having first claimed the designating principle, we abandoned it in order to keep the election of President out of the House of Representatives. The gentleman had misconceived the subject entirely; if he would only consider the subject again, he would find that nothing had been abandoned, nor anything new assumed; he would find that the principles correspond so exactly as to support and enforce each other. It is to place the election in the hands of the people we wish to designate; it is for the same purpose we wish to keep the election out of the House of Representatives; it is to prevent intrigues we wish to designate; it is to prevent intrigues we wish to keep the choice out of the House of Representatives; it is to conform the election, out of three instead of five, to the spirit of the Constitution, that we wish to adopt that number, and the wish to keep it out of the House of Representatives is already sanctioned by the Constitution. Where, then, is this contradiction—this abandonment of one principle and adoption of another? When he referred to one part of the gentleman's speech and compared it with another, he felt some concern when he considered the gentleman as the champion of the small States.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not profess to be the champion of the small States.

Mr. SMITH.—When the gentleman first rose he said he was the representative of a large, and he did call for the champions of the small States to come forth, in their defence; upon the failure of an answer to this challenge he had boldly entered the lists himself in their defence, and carried his chivalry so far as to marshal the contending parties, contrary to all former order, into sixteen small and one large State! What was the intention of this mode of distinction; to what end was it directed? Was it not to excite envy and jealousy, the worst of all passions which affect man? Was it consistent with professions of regard for the public good to encourage this rivalry of States—the commercial against the agricultural—the East against the South—the small against the large? There was something in this besides liberality. He says he is not the champion of the small States, yet he tells you how they could be stirred up and what would be the consequence if they were roused; he tells you of the distinction between federative and popular principles; and has employed all his ingenuity to induce the belief that we wish to undo the federative principle, to sacrifice it to the popular principle, which is, he has told you, the thing above all others which would stir up the small States and no doubt arm this classification of sixteen against the one State. But the people were not to be stirred up by such argument; they would know the value of national union and unanimity to their prosperity and liberty too well to be led away by anything we may say or do on this floor.

While he was up he would offer an observation or two on what had fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina. He had said that the object of the amendment was to prevent the election of a Federal Vice President. Undoubtedly such would be the effect of the amendment. The real effect of the amendment was two-fold—to guard against the dangers of intrigue and corruption, and to place the choice in the power of the people. Could that gentleman who was a member of the Convention object to render one of its fairest and best principles more safe and secure? Was it an objectionable principle to secure to the majority of the people the right of choosing their chief officers? This was intended by keeping the election out of the other House, and by limiting the number to three to leave as little room for corruption as possible, should it ever devolve by any accident on that House to make the choice. For if ever the right should again devolve on that House, he not only saw reason to apprehend corruption among ourselves but dread it from foreign nations. Had our people been as corrupt as European nations generally are, there was a facility for it at our late election; but the members were incorruptible and we were saved. It is to guard against the danger we look for this amendment. That gentleman being a member of the Convention who formed the Constitution deems it sacrilege to touch that instrument, yet in an early state of discussion he had found that sacred as it was to him there was a part which he wished to change, and had brought forward an amendment for the purpose. The merits of that gentleman's amendment he was not now called upon to discuss, but with the lights which he at present possessed, it was probable he might give it his approbation; and it surely could not be deemed so extraordinary if other gentlemen should wish to amend certain parts, when one of the framers of the Constitution had thought it susceptible of amendment.

Mr. PICKERING had not intended to have spoken on this question so far as it concerned the numbers; but as he should probably vote differently from his colleague, he conceived it proper to give his motives for his vote. His wishes for the entire preservation of the Constitution were so strong, that he regretted any change was contemplated to be made in it, and he wished if an alteration was made to keep as near as possible to the spirit of the Constitution as it now is, and it appeared to him that the number three conformed more to that spirit than the number five. He believed it to be the intention of the Constitution, that the people should elect. As to what gentlemen said concerning the will of the people, he paid but little regard to it. The will of the people! he did not know how the will of the people could be known—how gentlemen came by it; it would not be asserted that it was to be found in the newspapers, or in private society; in truth he believed it never had been fairly expressed on the subject. We have seen an amendment brought forward from New York, but was that an expression of the public opinion? if it was, it was a very remarkable one, for it contained an absurdity—visible to every one. He wished to avoid innovations on the Constitution, and to preserve the combined operation of federative and popular principles upon which it rested unimpaired.

Mr. WORTHINGTON hoped the number three would be adopted in preference to five. Nevertheless he approved so much of the principle of designation in the election of the President and Vice President, that rather than lose it he would vote for it with either number.

The yeas and nays being called for on filling up the blank with the largest number according to order; the votes were—yeas 12, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Butler, Condit, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan MacLay, Nicholas, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Taylor, and Worthington.

The question on the number three being inserted was then put, and the yeas and nays being demanded by one fifth of the members present; they were, yeas 21, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, MacLay, Nicholas, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Taylor, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Butler, Condit, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Plumer, Tracy Wells, and White.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 30.

Mr. JOHN SMITH presented the petition of William Gahagan and others, settlers at Dayton and Mercer's Station, in the State of Ohio, praying a deduction from the price of certain lands stipulated for, on the 15th of November, 1795, for reasons stated in the petition; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee appointed on the 1st instant, on the petition of John Crouse and others, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

On motion, it was agreed that the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,'" the order of the day, be postponed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report on the amendment to the Constitution as amended yesterday, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution, viz :

In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person voted for as President having a majority of the votes of all the Electors appointed, shall be the President; and if no person have such majority, then, from the three highest on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote: a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person Constitutionally ineligible to the office of President, shall be eligible to that of the Vice President of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY thought some provision should be made against the difficulties which might arise upon an equality of votes between several candidates. For example, though the amendment as it stands contemplates a choice from the three highest, there may be four who have equal numbers.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was not possible, under the designating principle, for four persons to have an equal number, and have a majority of the whole of the votes likewise.

Mr. ADAMS thought that some explanation should be given of the principle upon which the votes were to be counted; and if it were to go to the House of Representatives, whether the choice was to be made from the three highest numbers, even if three were unequal, or if only two were equal, in numbers, and the third being one of the highest, were still less in number than the other two.

Mr. BRADLEY said that, under the amendment as it now stood, a candidate with one vote may be chosen, (for there had been single votes,) and there being two candidates equal in votes, then the House of Representatives would have the power to choose the third. He would offer an amendment.

Mr. SMITH wished the gentleman would let his amendment lie over for the present, or it might be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR thought that the word "highest," in the eighteenth line, should be changed.

Mr. BUTLER.—It is evident gentlemen cannot agree among themselves. Now, if one side proposes one measure, and another a second measure, and so on to a third and a fourth, (all of which appeared to him objectionable,) there was little prospect of arriving at any useful conclusion. Yesterday we had heard of objections to extreme cases, and yet all the arguments used were drawn from extreme cases. If they were data then, they must be data now. But it was very clear that the real object was to take away from a portion of society every share of participation in the choice of Vice President. If the people could but have heard their representatives, they could not but smile at them. Notwithstanding the respect which he personally bore for the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAYLOR,) he did not completely explain, to his satisfaction, the menace against the smaller States. As to those arguments which were employed against the election devolving on the other House, he thought it was paying the people a poor compliment to say they make a selection of Representatives for that House in whom trust cannot be placed, and that their delegates resemble the representatives of rotten English boroughs: this he thought an extreme case—an extremely hard case. We had been told, also, that the people wished for the number three. He should like to have some other evidence than the bare opinion of gentlemen.

The PRESIDENT called to order.

Mr. BUTLER was willing to reserve what he had to say to a future time.

The PRESIDENT observed the House was now ready to receive amendments proposed by gentlemen.

Mr. BUTLER thought the amendment of the member from Vermont should have the preference, as it was first offered.

Mr. BRADLEY's amendment was called up, read, and lost—ayes 10, noes 20.

A desultory presentation of amendments, without going into detailed argument, now took place, in which Messrs. JACKSON, TAYLOR, NICHOLAS, WRIGHT, and TRACY, took part; when

Mr. ADAMS observed, from the multitude of amendments, it now became difficult to comprehend it. He suggested the propriety of adjourning, so that the amendments might be all printed, which was agreed to.

THURSDAY, December 1.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of James Simons, lieutenant in Colonel Washington's regiment, and brigade major in the corps of light troops of General Greene's army, during the late Revolutionary war, praying to be allowed the commutation as paid to other officers of similar grade, for reasons stated at large in the petition; and the petition was read, and referred to Messrs. BUTLER, JACKSON, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate took up the amended report, as amended the preceding day, which was as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That in lieu of the third paragraph of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit: 'The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. They shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such a majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But, in choosing the President, the vote shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States must be necessary to a choice.

"The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President. A quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person Constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

MR. DAYTON moved to strike out from the words "and Vice President," in the twelfth line, and all that concerned the Vice President in that paragraph.

THE PRESIDENT said it was not in order to strike out.

MR. DAYTON then moved to strike out all that related to a Vice President in the forty-third line, and to the end of the paragraph.

THE PRESIDENT said that it was not in order in that stage of the business to strike out any part.

MR. DAYTON.—If there is no way to come at the abolition of that office, when the majority of the Senate have it so much at heart, he must even give it up as a fruitless attempt.

MR. TRACY concurred in the decision of the Chair. The motion, however, arose from not reading the resolution three times, as was the usage with bills; in which cases, having amended them on a second reading, you cannot amend on a third without the consent of the whole. Here you have amended, and the resolution is taken up amended; if the Senate is determined it shall have but the one reading, there is no remedy; but the form of proceeding is so different from Parliamentary rules, that some correction of it should take place. He asked what would now be the regular question?

THE PRESIDENT.—On inserting the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole, in the report of the select committee.

MR. NICHOLAS said, the object of the gentleman from New Jersey was to abolish the office of Vice President; but the sense of the Senate had been already expressed on that subject. He hoped the time of the House would not be lost on a subject already decided.

MR. DAYTON would not ask any favor.

MR. ADAMS.—If an amendment cannot be inserted now, he thought the mode of proceeding inconsistent with order. He understood that, originally, it was decided that nothing should be considered as final which had not the sanction of two thirds; and he had held back some amendments under the impression that it was still open. If the rules of the Senate determine that a resolution shall have but one reading, there was a palpable contradiction between them and the rules of the other House.

THE PRESIDENT entered into a circumstantial detail of the progress of the proceedings on the amendment; and concluded by stating that the proceedings had been perfectly regular and according to order; that, in the present stage, all that had been adopted must be considered as ready for the final vote; that no amendment could be made inconsistent with what had been already agreed to in the detail; but that it was still open to any amendment not incompatible with what was already adopted.

MR. PICKERING offered an amendment in addition, and not incompatible with what had passed. It was to insert after the word "President," in the thirty-second line, the following words: "But if within twenty-four hours no election shall have taken place, then the President shall be chosen by law." This amendment he offered as a remedy by which we could avoid that civil war threatened on a former occasion.

MR. ADAMS wished the motion to be varied so as to come in after the 37th line. The motion he considered as embracing an object extremely important, and though the case was an extreme one, of no election being made, it was not unprecedented, for it had very recently happened in New Jersey, where no Governor had existed for a whole year. He did not approve of the precipitation with which the Senate was carrying this amendment forward. He considered it as intending to prevent a federal Vice President being chosen. He hoped that the House would proceed with more deliberation.

MR. PICKERING consented to the alteration proposed by his colleague.

MR. TRACY thought the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts like a great many others, it would require a dozen more amendments to explain it. How was the choice to be made of a person to be chosen by law?

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Mr. PICKERING.—The States might choose by lot, or by ballots in a box, which the President might collect; or a number of names might be put in a box from which the Speaker might draw one.

Mr. SMITH admired the ingenuity of gentlemen, as they left all consideration of what the people would wish or think about such a proceeding out of the question. Suppose they were to throw the dice for the Executive Chair! It would be equally wise with any of the expedients offered; the gentlemen could serve their friends; the candidates names might be written, and the highest throw have it!

Mr. TRACY.—However gentlemen may ridicule the ballot, it has a precedent. By the constitution of Kentucky it is provided that when two candidates are equal in votes, the choice shall be made by lot.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—That practice has been long exploded.

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—We had been told, some days ago, that a candidate proposed to be chosen by law, was near having his head cut off; such a process would be rather disagreeable to him. He wished to avoid it himself, and to prevent others getting into such a critical situation, and if the amendment were to be adopted, he had no doubt that nineteen times out of twenty, the choice would devolve on the House of Representatives. It was certainly not an unusual practice in elective governments to choose persons for eminent stations by lot. It was very common at Athens, and they were a very wise and prosperous people, and had an orderly and well regulated Government. It would certainly be a preferable mode to the choice at the point of the bayonet. If he had any conception of the operation of the proposed amendment, it would be to produce no election. The complex mode provided by the Constitution was conceived in great wisdom. It was necessary, when the country was agitated, to operate as a check upon party and irregular passions. Parties will always have their champions, and they will be always well known; to attack another champion is to restrain the passions by some degree of uncertainty during the contest. But, by the new amendment, it would be every man to his own book, and every demagogue would be a leader and a champion, and, in the contest, parties would be divided between the two principal champions, and a third would come in and win the race.

If every man were to act correctly, no party passions would prevail on an occasion so important; but carry the champions of two opposite parties to the House of Representatives, and instead of voting thirty-seven times before they decide, as on the last occasion, they will vote thirty hundred times. You are told that, at the last election, one was intended by the people for President, and the other for Vice President; but the Constitution knows no vote for Vice President. Alter it as you now propose, and let two candidates be equal, and then you will be told that they were both intended for President. What will be the consequence? On the third day of March neither party will give out, and it will end in the choice of a third man, who will not be the choice of the people, but one who will, by artful contrivances, bring himself to that place with the sole intention of getting in between them. Choice by lot would certainly be better than this. Would not any man prefer a choice by lot rather than such a course, as it would break up the Constitution, and leave the people without a President in whom they would confide?

The principle of the Constitution, of electing by electors, is certainly preferable to all others. One of the greatest evils that can happen is the throwing of the election into the House of Representatives. There, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Massachusetts, and New York, may combine; they may say to the other States, we will not vote for your man; for either of those States giving their whole votes to a third character may bring him in. We see the practice daily in Congressional elections, when both parties obstinately adhere to their candidate; a third is set up and carried in to the rejection of both. By the new mode proposed every man will have an interest to intrigue for himself to obtain the eminent station. Gentlemen may suppose that such is the predominancy of their party, they may carry in any President. But no party can long hold an ascendancy in power; they will ill treat each other—or some of them will disagree, and from the fragments new parties will arise, who will gain power and forget themselves, and again disagree, to make way for new parties. The Constitution was predicated upon the existence of parties; they will always exist, and names will not be wanting to rally under, and difference of interests will not be wanting for pretexts: the agricultural will be arrayed against the mercantile; the South against the East; the seaboard against the inland. As to what he had heard about cutting off heads, he supposed that could not have been meant as a threat; in his part of the country such a crime could not take place. The gentleman, however, must be supposed to know his neighbors better than he did, but he could not suspect such danger from a valiant people.

Mr. PICKERING said the amendment he had offered was suggested to him by the alarming picture of danger drawn by the gentleman from Maryland. He thought the dangers indeed exaggerated, though possibly they might not be; but he thought it proper to provide how elections should be conducted, and to determine between tumult or civil war and law.

Mr. SMITH did say that, at the last Presidential election, the party opposed to the present Chief Magistrate did contemplate laying aside the popular choice and electing a President by a law to be passed for the occasion, at the time: he had also said, that had the measure been carried into effect, the person, whoever he might have been, would have met the fate of an usurper, and his head would not have remained on his shoulders twenty-four hours.

Mr. WRIGHT.—It had been said, that we meant to precipitate this amendment of the Constitution—to make the minority swallow it; he hoped the gentlemen, in their eagerness to render it insipid, would not make it totally unpalatable to us: as they had proceeded, the modes they had proposed struck him at least by their novelty. Since what was offered was not satisfactory, and they were willing to commit it to chance, why did they not take up the ancient mode of grande bataille? we should have no objection to have it decided by the champions of both parties armed with tomahawks! Gentlemen talk of the danger and of the rights of the small States, do they expect that any man can think their professions serious, when they are, at the same time, willing to commit their rights to the chance of a lottery? The rights of freemen are not to be gambled away, or committed to chance, or sorcery, or witchcraft; we look to reason and experience for our guides; we seek for the means most conducive to the general happiness; to this, reason conducts us. By experience, we correct what may have escaped our sagacity at first, or may have been defective or erroneous in practice. It is upon these principles our Constitution is founded; it is for these words that the provision is made in the Constitution itself for its own amendment; and it is not compatible with reason, or with the principles of the Constitution, to commit anything to capricious fortune, in which reason and human rights are concerned. Gentlemen charge us now with a wish to press this amendment forward with precipitation; what do gentlemen mean by this? A few days only have passed, when the same gentlemen were eager for an immediate decision; they declared their readiness to decide immediately; that the subject was as well understood then as ever it would be; and that we delayed the decision to the exhaustion of their patience. The subject has, nevertheless, undergone a long discussion, and the time has only served to prove that the gentlemen were at first mistaken, or that the numerous amendments which they have brought forward have their origin in other considerations.

Mr. ADAMS had declared that he was ready to give his vote upon the amendment in the first stage; but it did not therefore follow, that when his opinion on the whole was not likely to prevail, that he should endeavor to render it as palatable as possible. He was totally adverse to any decision by lot, and agreed perfectly with the gentleman from Maryland, that it was not a mode suited to the principles of our Government. But gentlemen say there is a defect, and wish to provide a remedy. He had drawn up an amendment which he should offer to the House, if that of his colleague should not be approved. He confessed he did approve of the designating principle, and for one among other reasons, that the present mode is too much like choice by lot. For instance, A may be intended by a large majority of the people for President, and B as Vice President; yet the votes might be so disposed, or chance might operate so contrary to intention, that the votes for B should exceed by a vote those for A. This was a defect in the Constitution; and there was a further reason why he was in favor of the designating principle, and that was, that it appeared to be called for from all parts of the United States. It was very true, as had been observed, that sometime ago the opposers of the amendment did press for a decision; but he had seen those dispositions prevail alternately; but the minority had not so much pressed for a decision as for the discussion of the question.

Mr. PICKERING suggested his wish to substitute forty-eight hours for twenty-four, in his amendment; and if the election should not then take place, a choice to be made in such manner as the House should direct.

The question, on Mr. PICKERING's motion, was then put and negatived, without a division.

Mr. ADAMS then moved the following amendment: In the 37th line, after the word "choice," insert—

"And in case the House of Representatives shall not, within ——— days, effect the choice in manner aforesaid, and there be a Vice President duly elected, the said Vice President shall discharge the powers and duties of the President of the United States. But if the office of Vice President be also vacant, then the said powers and duties of President of the United States shall be discharged by such person as Congress may by law direct, until a new election shall be had, in manner already prescribed by law."

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that there should be provision made for the choice so made, to remain only until such period as the Electors could be called again.

Mr. DAYTON hoped the gentleman did not mean to lay a larger patch upon the Constitution than the hole they make in it required. Had gentlemen considered, that when there is a Vice President, that in case of death or inability, he alone can exercise the powers of the Executive, and that you cannot place any person over his head?

Mr. ADAMS.—The gentleman is certainly right; he had offered his proposition hastily. The observations which arise in this discussion evidently prove that we have not as full a consideration of the subject as it is susceptible of.

Mr. WRIGHT.—Gentlemen did not perceive that the House of Representatives are Constitutionally bound and impelled to choose when it devolves upon them: they are sworn to do their duty. The amendments offered are wholly founded on the presumed corruption of the House of Representatives. You may as well make provisions against the corruption of a jury.

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—There is another point which gentlemen appear not to have taken into view: how the objections of their oaths are to operate or be enforced, when the functions themselves expire on the third of March. There is another view of the subject, which ought not to be passed over: The members are sworn, to be sure, but one half of the House may sincerely believe that A is the popular choice; while the other half may as sincerely believe that the wishes of the majority are with B; and how are we to compel them by moral obligations, when the obligation rests wholly on the consciences of the individuals? The true principle, then, would be to make provision for the appointment of a person who should carry on the functions of Government till the Electors may again meet and choose a President. A provision vesting in the Senate the right of choice, even for one year, may be a motive for the other House to perform their duty promptly. It was not pleasant to discuss some topics, but we must discuss them, if we mean to avoid evil. We must suppose the existence of faction, of party, and even corruption, for we know that evil passions do and will exist, and that, by discussing, we guard against them. A House of Representatives elected two years before your Presidential election, may hold sentiments very different from him; the public mind may change in the time; and a party losing power may be led away by passion to conspire and throw every difficulty in the way.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Mr. BRADLEY thought the sentiments of the gentleman last up perfectly correct. He was satisfied that, if the House made no choice, the Vice President would administer the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT said that although the functions of the House of Representatives would expire with the third of March, yet there was, assuredly, time enough between the second Wednesday in February, and the third of March, to make a proper choice; nothing but obstinacy, or worse, would prevent an election; he would shut them up, like a jury, until they had made a choice: he could not conceive a case wherein any number of men in Congress would dare to set themselves up against the country, and put its happiness and their own lives at hazard, in such a way as the gentleman supposed.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) appears not to be perfectly satisfied with his own amendment; and certainly the gentleman from Connecticut had shown that the amendment was defective; the candor of that gentleman he must acknowledge, he had taken the strongest hold possible of the subject; he had laid the fruits of experience before you, and pointed out the weakness which you had to protect. He would recommend it to the gentleman from Massachusetts to alter his amendment, so as to make it, that, in case the House should fail to choose, then, in four days after, the Vice President shall be President.

Mr. ADAMS saw a new difficulty there also, for there may not be a majority for both, and provision will be necessary for the vacancy of the Vice Presidency.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought there would be no danger of the Senate omitting to elect their President, who is, on a vacancy, the Vice President in fact. As to shutting the House up like a jury in a dark room, depriving them of fire, light, and food, he thought the measure too strong; he did not wish to see them at the mercy of the sheriff, who upon their laches might call in the posse comitatus, and trundle them out of the District, or send them to Coventry. If the House of Representatives should not make a choice, he saw no reason why the Government should not go on until an election should take place.

Mr. COCKE was astonished to see gentlemen going over so much unnecessary ground. Could they suppose the people so indifferent to their own rights as not to make an election? Or, do gentlemen mean all these cavillings as amusement—to display their ingenuity at finding fault? If there should be any failure of choice, why could not the Secretary of State arrange and carry on the Executive business until an election should again take place?

Mr. TRACY rose.

Mr. COCKE called for the question—the question!

Mr. TRACY.—Does the gentleman mean to call for the question while I am on the floor? I will not sit down upon such a call. What is the question, sir?

Mr. DAYTON hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. ADAMS thought the deliberation of one or two hours could not be thrown away.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped the decision on the amendment would not be pressed upon the House. What! is it proposed to take the choice of President out of the hands of the Electors and place it wholly in the House of Representatives, and tell them, hold out only four days, and you will then have the whole power in your hands; you may set aside all consideration for the wishes of your constituents—set popular opinion at defiance, and please yourselves by choosing a President of whom the people never thought? Gentlemen should avoid this dangerous path which they wish to prepare; the people will not bear to be frowned upon by those whom their breath has made, and can unmake.

Sir, it is our wish to prevent all these dangerous or fatal courses and consequences; and we should keep in mind, that whatever we may conclude upon here, is completely guarded, not alone by the necessary consent of the other House, but that of three-fourths of the States. The Constitution, sir, would be preferable as it is, without the odious and anti-republican forms which gentlemen propose to engross upon it. What, sir, determine a most important principle of effective government by a non-effective act—determine an election by holding out a temptation to non-election! He should prefer having the choice open to the Representatives bound by oath, by duty, and by the Constitution, to such an alternative. If men so placed would be so blind to the calls of duty, the public indignation would bring them to their senses before the fourth of March. Honor and their oaths, sir, would bind them. He had too much confidence in the choice of his countrymen, and of the virtue and morality of those who are sent to the important stations of Representatives, to think they disregarded their oaths or their duty. Some gentlemen tell us, indeed, they know of no persons who would raise their hands against an usurper, if he had been set up, and insinuate that it would be a crime; but they find ready belief for acts ten thousand degrees more base and heinous in themselves; they can believe their countrymen capable of the breach of every tie of honor, of oaths, and of duty. Gentlemen must speak from their own knowledge; for his part, he was happy to say there were no such men among his acquaintance nor in his neighborhood.

The arguments which gentlemen draw from their experience would be with him powerful ones for opposing the measure which they are brought forth to sustain. For if men elected to such stations as seats in Congress are capable of the breach of every obligation of honor and oath, the greatest care should be taken to keep the power of election forever out of their hands, by rendering it impossible for the people not to elect; nay, he would prefer carrying the election to the individual vote of every citizen, without the intervention of Electors, to suffering it to go into any body liable to such dishonor.

An observation of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) produced a sensation which at once showed that something besides the care of the people's rights had an influence here. He proposes that the proper officer, the Vice President, should succeed to the Presidential chair upon a failure of election or vacancy after a few short months. Whence arose the agitation and interest excited by this proposition? Is it because we wish not to see a man seated in the Executive chair whom the people never contemplated to place there, and who never had a vote?

Mr. DAYTON.—You are about to designate who shall be President and who Vice President; and some gentlemen have gone so far as to favor the choice of one who had not a vote for either office. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) indeed, professes to have in view the succession of the Vice President to the Executive Chair when vacant. But gentlemen should perceive, that if you designate, the principle will be totally changed. He could not assent to the conclusion of some gentlemen on another point. If anything could be understood from the Constitution more clearly than another, it was that the votes are given to two persons for President, and that, as has been observed before, the Constitution never notices a vote for the office of Vice President. How, then, can it be said which was the person intended? The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) had said that one of the candidates at the late election had not a single vote for President, while the official returns show that each and every vote was the same for both candidates as President.

Mr. TAYLOR.—That matter appears susceptible of a very simple explanation. There can be no question that in form, the votes for each candidate were equal; but that is not the question; the quo animo must be taken into view. Would any gentleman say no preference was intended? It is very true that such was the form, but looking to the well known intention, have you not in the very fact stated an evidence that the principle of designation is essential, were it only to prevent the consummation of an act never contemplated or expected?

Mr. DAYTON was for a postponement of the amendment.

Mr. JACKSON was for postponement also.

Mr. ADAMS's amendment was postponed, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR wished to offer an amendment as an addition to the report—

"Provided, That whenever the right of choosing a President shall devolve upon the House of Representatives, the Vice President shall act as President, in case they fail to make such choice, in like manner as in case of the death or resignation of the President."

It was moved that this, with the other amendment, be printed; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 2.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 28th of November last, for the appointment of a committee, to report by bill or otherwise, respecting the naval armament of the United States; and, having agreed thereto, Ordered, That MESSRS. SAMUEL SMITH, ISRAEL SMITH, and JOHN SMITH, be the committee.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The order of the day being the amendment proposed in the House of Representatives, to be made to the Constitution of the United States, and the report of the committee being under consideration,

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, desired to withdraw his motion of the preceding day, in order to accommodate the terms of his proposition to the wishes of gentlemen. His only object was to obtain the principle, and provided that was obtained in such a manner as to promise an accomplishment of the good intended thereby, he should consider the words in which the provision was to be couched of inferior moment. In lieu of the addition which he offered before, he now proposed to insert after the word choice, in the 37th line, the following words:

"And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in case of the death or other Constitutional disability of the President."

Mr. ADAMS had no sort of objection to this addition to the paragraph; it reached his ideas as far as it went; but he conceived that though this made a very necessary provision for the case of the President, it did not go far enough, inasmuch as no provision was made in case there should be no Vice President. He would submit this case to gentlemen, that if there was no Vice President existing nor any more than a President chosen, in the event of a high state of party spirit, would it be difficult to foresee that there would be much room left for contention and evil? Unless provision should be made against the contingency, therefore, the amendment would be imperfect, in his mind. Like the gentleman from Virginia, he was not tied to words, but he thought it worth while to employ two lines to provide against the danger.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Mr. HILLHOUSE concurred in the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia but he hoped the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts would also be adopted.

Mr. PICKERING objected to the length of time allowed for the House of Representatives to decide. We have been told that the small States, from the smaller number of votes, are exposed to corruption; he wished no time to be left for corruption to operate, and he therefore desired that the period for the House of Representatives to decide should be limited to forty-eight hours or three days.

Mr. WRIGHT approved of the amendment that had been offered in all its parts; and the more so as it in effect supplies a deficiency which exists in the Constitution even as it now stands.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas 22, nays 10, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Butler, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

Mr. ADAMS offered another amendment, of the following effect, to be added to the provisions concerning the election of Vice President:

“And if there shall be no Vice President duly elected within ten days after the fourth of March, then the power and duties of the President of the United States shall be discharged by such person as shall be by law invested with that power, until such time as a new election by Electors shall take place.”

Mr. TRACY wished to know why ten days was the period fixed?

Mr. ADAMS.—Because the amendment proposed gives the House of Representatives until the fourth of March, during which time the old Vice President continues in office; and ten days appeared to him a reasonable period; but he was not tied to any particular number of days.

Mr. TRACY would prefer the word “vacant,” suggested yesterday, to the words “not duly elected.”

Mr. HILLHOUSE was not disposed to concur with the proposed amendment; he did not think a period of agitation a proper one to make choice of an officer of so much power; he would prefer making provision by law before the happening of the event; for, in a high state of party he could see no likelihood of an agreement, and out of disagreement confusion might arise. His wish was to have some person designated who should discharge the Executive duties until an election should take place, and that this officer should be previously fixed upon, so that party spirit should have no room for agitation.

Mr. JACKSON could not discern the necessity of the proposition now offered; the case proposed to be provided against, he thought so extreme as likely never to happen. Besides, the mover appeared not to have taken it into consideration that one-third of the Senate go out at the close of the second session of every Congress by rotation, and would he have only two-thirds to make the law which was to provide for this choice? Upon the principle of the general amendment, he had not at first made up his convictions, but the amendment adopted had removed his doubts, and he thought this addition to this amendment unnecessary. He hoped the Senate would abide by that they had already agreed to, and preserve the right of choice, to the people.

Mr. WRIGHT.—There was another difficulty which the gentleman from Massachusetts appears not to have foreseen. To make a law it is not enough that the Senate are present even if complete; the House of Representatives is necessary to an act of legislation, and that body can have no existence after the fourth day of March, nor within the ten days suggested, for they could not, if all elected, be called even by proclamation within that time; and further, if there should be no election of President, there would be no power to convene Congress; so that the proposed addition is improper altogether.

Mr. ADAMS did not feel extremely solicitous for the proposition; when the Constitution is proposed to be amended, however, he was disposed to offer every suggestion which might appear to him calculated to render it more perfect. The objections offered by the gentleman from Georgia, highly as he respected his opinion, did not appear to him conclusive; for his calculations of time and circumstances do not entirely correspond with experience past. The President has at all times heretofore been inaugurated after the House of Representatives had closed its session by limitation, and the Senate had been uniformly assembled for the purpose of the inauguration. Here then is a body in session, and if there shall not be a Vice President chosen, they can and must proceed to choose one, and that choice would of course fall, as proposed, upon one of the candidates. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) had mistaken his view, concerning the choice of a person by law; his intention certainly was to provide for the future contingency by a previous law.

Mr. JACKSON still conceived the gentleman's proposition founded in mistake; for it would be impracticable for the Senate to act, since, according to the rules of the Senate, two-thirds of the whole are necessary to form a quorum; one third must Constitutionally go out of that body at the time, and the absence of a single member would disable the Senate from business.

Mr. ADAMS.—There would remain still two-thirds of the Senate, and it would be the duty of the Executive to call them together, as had been done in some cases; and as to the deduction of the third by rotation, there are several of the small States that elected their Senators several months before the period. To argue that they would neglect it, would be to argue that the States are indifferent to their representation on this floor.

Mr. JACKSON.—We know that vacancies do occur from other causes than indifference or neglect of States; we know that at this moment New York has but one Representative on this floor, and that New Jersey had but very lately been so much embarrassed by a faction as to leave her for sometime without more than one Senator.

SENATE.

Amendment to the Constitution.

DECEMBER, 1803.

The question on the amendment of Mr. Adams was then put and lost without a division.

Mr. PICKERING.—The case which the gentleman from Georgia founded his arguments upon applies to a non-election, and thought such a case an extreme one; he thought differently, and the Constitution as it now stands has made a provision for such an exigency. Some provision should be made for such a case; he would therefore move an amendment, which would provide for the event of a non-election, to insert after the words President:

“But if on the 4th of March the office of Vice President shall be vacant, then the powers which devolve by the Constitution on the Vice President, shall be exercised by such persons as the law shall direct, until a new election.”

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—This amendment would supply all that was proposed by the allowance of ten days in a former amendment, and it seemed to him indispensable, because as the non-election of both President and Vice President may happen, there should be some organ to keep the wheels of Government in motion. It appeared to him to be necessary to provide for this contingency as for that of the death of the President or Vice President.

The amendment was lost, without a division.

The main question of the whole resolution then recurring,

Mr. WHITE, of Delaware, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, it may be expected that we, who oppose the present measure, and especially those of us who belong to the smaller States, and who think the interests of those States will be most injuriously affected by its adoption, shall assign some reasons for our opinion, and for the resistance we give it: I will for myself endeavor to do so. I know well the prejudices of many in favor of this proposed amendment to the Constitution; I know too, and acknowledge with pleasure, the weight of abilities on the other side of the House by which those prejudices, if I may so be permitted to call them, will be sustained; this might perhaps be sufficient to create embarrassment or even silence on my part, but for the consciousness I feel in the rectitude of my views, and my full reliance on the talents of those with whom I have the honor generally to think and act. Upon a subject of the nature and importance of the one before us a great diversity of sentiment must be expected, and is perhaps necessary to the due and proper investigation of it. Without detaining the Senate with further preliminary remarks, presuming upon that patience and polite indulgence that are at all times extended by this honorable body to gentlemen who claim their attention, I will proceed immediately to the subject of the resolution; barely premising that notwithstanding the opinions of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) and the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) whose opinions I highly respect, I must yet think with my honorable friend from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) that the Constitution of the United States bears upon the face of it the strongest marks of its having been made under the influence of State classifications. It was a work of compromise, though not formed, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, by the large States yielding most, but by the smaller States yielding much more to the general good.

It will be recollected that, previous to the adoption of the Constitution, on all Legislative subjects, in fact, on every measure of the Constitution, each State had an equal voice; but very different is the case now, when, in the popular branch of your Government, you see one State represented by twenty-two members, and another by but one, voting according to numbers. So that, notwithstanding the ideas of those gentlemen, and the declaration of an honorable member from Maryland, on my right, (Mr. SMITH,) that, during his ten years' service in Congress, he had never seen anything like State jealousies, State divisions, or State classification, I must be permitted to predicate part of my argument upon this business. Should any gentleman be able to show that the foundation is unsound, the superstructure of course will be easily demolished. Admitting, then, sir, for the sake of argument, that there were no very great objections to this proposed alteration in the mode of electing a President and Vice President, and that it were now part of the Constitution, it might be unwise to strike it out; unless much stronger arguments had been urged against than I have heard in favor of it, yet I would not now vote for its adoption. What appears specious in theory, may prove very inconvenient and embarrassing in practice, and my objections go to any alteration of the Constitution at this time; we have not given it a fair experiment, and it augurs not well to the peace and happiness of the United States to see so much increasing discontent upon this subject. so many projected alterations to the great charter of our Union and our liberties; not less than four are now upon our tables, and which, if adopted, will materially change the most valuable features of the Constitution. The first alters the mode of electing the President and Vice President; the second changes the ground upon which the Vice President is to be appointed by the Senate, in case one is not elected by the Electors, according to the Constitution; the third extends the powers of the Senate in the choice of this latter officer beyond what was ever contemplated by the people of this country; and the fourth, which is not now immediately before us, goes to incapacitate any citizen from being eligible to the office of President more than a certain number of years. All these important changes we are about to introduce into the Constitution at once; and, indeed, were attempted to be forced into a final vote upon them, in little more than the space of one day from the moment they were submitted to us. Are we aware of what we are about? Is this the way in which the Constitution was formed? Was it put together with as much facility and as little reflection as we are tearing it to pieces? No, Mr. President, it was constructed after much thought, after long and mature deliberation, by the collected wisdom and patriotism of America, by such a set of men as I fear this country will never again see assembled; and we should be cautious how we touch it. The fewer changes we make in it, the longer it remains; the older it grows the higher veneration will every American entertain for it; the man born to its blessings, will respect it more than him who saw its birth; he will regard it not only as the great bulwark of his liberties, but as the price of the blood of his ancestors—as a sacred legacy from his father, deposited with him for the benefit of himself, and in trust for his posterity. But if, in this way, every succeeding Congress, every party enjoying the short-lived triumph of a day, shall be mutilating it with alterations, from whatever motives, either to thwart their political opponents, or to answer particular purposes, ere long no trace of the original instrument will remain; it will be kept in a state of tottering infancy, until some Gallic Cæsar, turning to his advantage an unhappy moment of popular phrenzy, may make the last change, by trampling upon its ruins, and substituting the strong arm of power in its place.

Amendment to the Constitution.

What, sir, let me ask, are the objects of these proposed amendments? The first, we are told, will so mark, so designate the man to be President, as to close forever the doors upon that subject! Could this be the effect, the adoption of it would indeed be wise and provident; but I fear a directly contrary tendency, that will open a new and immense field for intrigue.

The United States are now divided, and will probably continue so, into two great political parties; whenever, under this amendment, a Presidential election shall come round, and the four rival candidates be proposed, two of them only will be voted for as President—one of these two must be the man; the chances in favor of each will be equal. Will not this increased probability of success afford more than double the inducement to those candidates, and their friends, to tamper with the Electors, to exercise intrigue, bribery, and corruption, as in an election upon the present plan, where the whole four would be voted for alike, where the chances against each are as three to one, and it is totally uncertain which of the gentlemen may succeed to the high office? And there must, indeed, be a great scarcity of character in the United States, when, in so extensive and populous a country, four citizens cannot be found, either of them worthy even of the Chief Magistracy of the nation. But, Mr. President, I have never yet seen the great inconvenience that has been so much clamored about, and that will be provided against in future by substituting this amendment. There was, indeed, a time when it became necessary for the House of Representatives to elect, by ballot, a President of the United States from the two highest in vote, and they were engaged here some days, as I have been told, in a very good-humored way, in the exercise of that Constitutional right; they at length decided; and what was the consequence? The people were satisfied, and here the thing ended. What does this prove? that the Constitution is defective? No, sir, but rather the wisdom and efficiency of the very provision intended to be stricken out, and that the people are acquainted with the nature of their Government; and give me leave to say, if fortune had smiled upon another man, and that election had eventuated in another way, the consequence would have been precisely the same; the great mass of the people would have been content and quiet; and those factious, restless disorganizers, that are the eternal disturbers of all well administered Governments, and who then talked of resistance, would have had too much prudence to hazard their necks in so dangerous an enterprise. I will not undertake to say that there was no danger apprehended on that occasion. I know many of the friends of the Constitution had their fears; the experiment however, proved them groundless; but what was the danger apprehended pending the election in the House of Representatives? Was it that they might choose Colonel Burr or Mr. Jefferson President? Not at all; they had, notwithstanding what had been said on this subject by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) a clear Constitutional right to choose either of them, as much so as the Electors in the several States had to vote for them in the first instance; the particular man was a consideration of but secondary importance to the country; the only ground of alarm was, lest the House should separate without making any choice, and the Government be without a head, the consequences of which no man could well calculate. The present attempt, to say the least of it, as has been well observed by my honorable friend from Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) is taking advantage of a casualty to alter the Constitution that astonished every one when it happened, and that no man can imagine, in the ordinary course of events, will ever arise again. Sir, every hour that is added to the age of our Government, every day's increasing population of our country, every State admitted into the Union, renders still more remote even this improbable contingency. Gentlemen have urged, with exulting confidence, and particularly the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that the people have long thought on this subject, and prepared for the amendment, and expect its adoption. I respect the sentiments of the people as highly as any man when they are well digested and clearly expressed; but in my mind this is a dangerous ground to advance far upon, without examining it well for ourselves; it is an argument that will apply alike to almost every question of importance, and goes to preclude debate upon them; for it is well known that there are few such submitted to us that have not been previously the subject of thought and speculative conversation out of doors. Ours is a country of politicians, and from the nature of our Government must continue so; every member of society feels such a portion of interest in the affairs of the nation as to excite inquiry; be his lot humble or exalted, be his sentiments right or wrong, he expresses them, as he is entitled to do, with freedom; but is it abroad in the country that the most important measures of the Government are to be matured and decided upon? Is it in private circles, in caucuses, in clubs, in coffee-houses, streets, and bar-rooms, that great Constitutional questions are to be settled? And are we convened here but to register the crude decrees of such assemblages, or only for the humble purpose of answering to the call of our Secretary with a yea or nay? If the argument proves anything, it amounts to this. Would the gentleman from Maryland, or any other honorable member, be content to hold his seat upon such terms? If so, he may indulge himself in one consolation, that no private citizen would envy him the place; but for myself I claim the exercise of higher and more responsible privileges of thinking and acting for myself, holding it my duty, so far as I am capable, to assign to my constituents the reasons that govern my public conduct.

It has of late, Mr. President, become fashionable to attach very little importance to the office of Vice President, to consider it a matter but of small consequence who the man may be; to view his post merely as an idle post of honor, and the incumbent as a cypher in the Government; or according to the idea expressed by an honorable member from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) quoting, I believe, the language of some Eastern politician, as a fifth wheel to a coach; but in my humble opinion this doctrine is both incorrect and dangerous. The Vice President is not only the second officer of Government in point of rank, but of importance, and should be a man possessing, and worthy of the confidence of the nation. I grant, sir, should this designating mode of election succeed, it will go very far to destroy, not the certain or contingent duties of the office, for the latter by this resolution are considerably extended, but what may be much more dangerous, the personal consequence and worth of the officer; by rendering the Electors more indifferent about the reputation and qualification of the candidate, seeing they vote for him but as a secondary character; and which may occasion this high and important trust to be deposited in very unsafe hands. By a provision in the first section of the second article of the Constitution, "in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President"—and he is Constitutionally the President, not until another can be made only, but of the residue of the term, which may be nearly four years; and this is not to be supposed a remote or improbable case. In the State to which I have the honor to belong, within a few years past, two instances have happened of the place of Governor becoming vacant, and the duties of the office, according to the constitution of that State, devolving upon the Speaker of the Senate. We know well too, generally speaking, that before any man can acquire a sufficient share of the public confidence to be elected President, the people must have long been acquainted with his character and his merit; he must have proved himself a good and faithful servant, and will of course be far advanced in years, when the chances of life will be much against him. It may indeed, owing to popular infatuation, or some other extraordinary causes, be the ill fate of our country, that an unworthy, designing man, grown old and gray, in the ways of vice and hypocrisy, shall for a time dishonor the Presidential chair, or it may be the fortune of some young man to be elected, but those will rarely happen. The Convention in constructing this part of the Constitution, in settling the first and second offices of the Government, and pointing out the mode of filling, aware of the probability of the Vice President succeeding to the office of President, endeavored to attach as much importance and respectability to his office as possible, by making it uncertain at the time of voting, which of the persons voted for should be President, and which Vice President; so as to secure the election of the best men in the country, or at least those in whom the people reposed the highest confidence, to the two offices—thus filling the office of Vice President, with one of our most distinguished citizens, who would give respectability to the Government, and in case of the Presidency becoming vacant, having at his post a man Constitutionally entitled to succeed, who had been honored with the second largest number of the suffrages of the people for the same office, and who of consequence would be probably worthy of the place, and competent to its duties. Let us now, Mr. President, examine for a moment the certain effect of the change about to be made, or what must be the operation of this designating principle, if you introduce it into the Constitution; now the Elector cannot designate, but must vote for two persons as President, leaving it to circumstances not within his power to control which shall be the man: of course he will select two characters, each suitable for that office, and the second highest in vote must be the Vice President; but upon this designating plan the public attention will be entirely engrossed in the election of the President, in making one great man. The eyes of each contending party will be fixed exclusively upon their candidate for this first and highest office, no surrounding object can be viewed at the same time, they will be lost in his disc. The office of President, is in point of honor, profit, trust, and influential patronage so infinitely superior to any other place attainable in this Government, that, in the pursuit and disposal of it, all minor considerations will be forgotten, everything will be made to bend, in order to subserve the ambitious views of the candidates and their friends. In this angry conflict of parties, against the heat and anxiety of this political warfare, the Vice Presidency will either be left to chance, or what will be much worse, prostituted to the basest purposes; character, talents, virtue, and merit, will not be sought after, in the candidate. The question will not be asked, is he capable? is he honest? But can he by his name, by his connexions, by his wealth, by his local situation, by his influence, or his intrigues, best promote the election of a President? He will be made the mere stepping-stone of ambition. Thus, by the death or other Constitutional inability of the President to do the duties of the office, you may find at the head of your Government as First Magistrate of the nation, a man who has either smuggled or bought himself into office. Who, not having the confidence of the people, or feeling the Constitutional responsibility of his place, but attributing his elevation merely to accident, and conscious of the superior claims of others, will be without restraint upon his conduct, without that strong inducement to consult the wishes of the people, and to pursue the true interests of the nation, that the hope of popular applause, and the prospect of re-election, would offer. Such a state of things might be productive of incalculable evils; for it is, as I fear time will show, in the power of a President of the United States to bring this Government into contempt, and this country to disgrace, if not to ruin. Again, sir, if this amendment succeeds, if you designate the person voted for as President, and the person voted for as Vice President, you hold out an irresistible temptation to contracts and compromises among the larger States for these offices; it will be placing the choice of the two highest officers in the Government so completely in their power, that the five largest States, viz: Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, may not only act in every previous arrangement relative to the appointment of these officers without the necessity of consulting the other twelve, but may totally exclude them from any participation in the election. The whole number of Electors, according to the present representation in Congress, will be one hundred and seventy-seven; these five States will have ninety-six of them, a clear majority of eight, and should they agree among themselves they can say absolutely who shall be the President. The other twelve States will not have even the humble privilege of choosing between their candidates; for their whole number of votes being but eighty-one given to the candidate for the Vice Presidency as President, would be but thrown away, since the other would still have his designated majority of eight for that place. Should it be said that such a coalition is improbable, I answer that my opinion is different, and it is enough for me that it is possible. Again, sir, counting only the States of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, these four will be found to be entitled to eighty-two Electors, wanting seven of a majority of the whole number; so that, leaving North Carolina among the smaller States, if they unite, and can by any species of influence, by promises of offices, bribery, or corruption, gain over to their interest but seven of the Electors belonging to the other States, they can in like manner appoint who they please. I might go on to show that lopping even Massachusetts from the list, the other four, viz: New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, could with very little difficulty effect the same object, since they are entitled to seventy-seven Electors. And now let me ask gentlemen representing the twelve smaller States, if they are prepared to yield up not only the high and honorable ground upon which the Constitution has placed them in the House of Representatives in case of an election for a President to be had there, but to vest in the five larger States, or even in a smaller number of them, whenever they shall be pleased to exercise it, the exclusive power of appointing the President and Vice President of the United States?

Again, Mr. President, admitting these coalitions of the larger States, of which I have been speaking, for the purpose of appointing a President and Vice President by themselves, may none of them ever take place under this amendment, if adopted, notwithstanding its strong and natural tendency to such an effect, (and this is certainly admitting much more than gentlemen on the other side of the House could in argument have any right to demand of me,) yet there is one other which I am sure, in candor, they must grant me, is not only possible, but very probable, indeed, upon a subject of this kind—I mean the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, together with the Territories upon the waters of the Mississippi, that are every day growing into States. And such is the rapidly increasing population of that country, that, after the next census, it will be forever in their power, upon this designating plan of election, to appoint the President and Vice President of the United States. The other ten Middle and Eastern States will have only to acquiesce in the choice, without, as I before observed, the power even of electing between the candidates, and much less the right of being consulted, in the first instance, as to the suitable and proper characters. Gentlemen will, I hope, do me the justice to believe that I mention these coalitions as likely to be entered into, only in relation to this particular object. I have no doubt but that these States are as well disposed, and as much attached to the Union, as any that belong to it; but who does not know the indissoluble bonds that will bind together the citizens of that Southern and Western country, in the pursuit of an object of this kind? Their similarity of manners, of habits, of laws, of civil institutions, of local interests, added to their native prejudices and ties of consanguinity, unite them inseparably, and make their views the same. Yet gentlemen, to my utter astonishment, tell us that this amendment is intended to preclude intrigue. Sir, no other measure could be adopted that would so effectually produce it. It will create ill blood between the smaller and the larger States—between one part of the Union and another. It will give rise to local prejudices, to envious territorial distinctions, to State schisms; and I should not wonder if, in the end, it were to be the means of plunging this country into a civil war, and of producing a separation.

As to the second and third alterations proposed in this resolution, that of enlarging the ground upon which the Vice President may be appointed by the Senate, by giving them authority to elect from the two highest, whenever no person has a majority of the whole number of votes, whereas now they can choose but in the case of two persons being upon a vote, and thus extending the powers of the Senate in the election of this officer, they would, at first view, seem to be mere matters of speculation, introduced for the sake of change only, or for the want of something else to employ ourselves about. No inconvenience is even pretended to have been experienced under those provisions of the Constitution, as they now stand; yet we, in the plenitude of our wisdom, are about to recommend to the several State Legislatures an alteration of them; and so every successive Congress, which will no doubt in the same ratio as the present be more wise, more learned, more enlightened, and more patriotic, than their predecessors, will improve upon our example, until the Constitution shall be entirely regenerated. But the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY) now tells us—and I believe correctly—that these amendments, though not before contemplated, result necessarily from the introduction of the designating principle into the Constitution. Does not this show us, most clearly, the danger of meddling with the Constitution at all? Out of the single amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) that of designating the person voted for as President, and the person voted for as Vice President, these two other very important changes have already grown—have forced themselves upon our consideration; and another of still greater importance immediately presents itself, which gentlemen on all sides seem to think must shortly follow—that of abolishing entirely the office of Vice President. Several honorable members have told us that their minds have long been made up on this subject; that they had long since seen the necessity of introducing this change in the mode of electing a President and Vice President; but never before saw its operation upon other parts of the Constitution, or that any other alterations must be the necessary consequence of its adoption. The honorable mover of this subject, from New York, who, according to his own account, had been two years maturing it in his mind, and who pressed the immediate adoption of it, with even more than his usual eloquence, had never before seen the bearing of his own resolution upon the Constitution, and was himself one of the first to vote for striking out part, and to second a motion of a gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. BRADLEY,) who I do not now see in his place, for a very important amendment to another part, of it. Indeed, sir, after all the deep deliberation bestowed upon it by the learned mover, the resolution, as at first introduced, provided very carefully for an impossible case, that in the nature of things could never happen—that of two candidates, upon the designating plan of election, having each a majority of the whole number of votes for President. Added to all this, sir, recollect the awkward and embarrassed situation of the Senate for a week past on this subject. Every step we have taken has involved us in new difficulties. We have several times been so completely lost in the mazes of our own amendments as to be under the necessity of adjourning, in order to have them printed, that we might see what we had done; and no sooner were they laid before us, than they directed our eyes to some other part of the Constitution where an unexpected injury had been sustained; and all this has arisen from the attempt to introduce the designating principle into the Constitution. The favorers of the amendments have been alternately at variance with themselves and with each other, and sometimes so scattered that no two of them could agree; at other times, all were entirely lost. These are the most irresistible arguments, the strongest circumstances, to show how dangerous it is to attempt any alteration in the Constitution; and that, as has been urged on a former occasion, every comma has its meaning. You cannot strike out a word from one section, without inflicting a wound upon some other. So nicely has it been woven together, that no thread can be spared. Every principle it contains is a keystone, and no one of them can be removed without endangering the edifice. No man can tell how these amendments may operate—how they enfeeble and shackle other parts of the Constitution—or what other alterations they may render necessary. Look at this paper now, and recollect what it has been. At different times it has assumed different shapes—at one time proposing but one alteration; at another, four or five. Thus, one alteration will beget the necessity for another, and so we shall have to go on in this work ad infinitum, as the regular series of cause and effect. It may be said that this second amendment, so far as it goes to extend the powers of the Senate in the election of the Vice President, if adopted, may prove advantageous to the smaller States. I grant the possibility, but such advantage is too casual, too remote and unimportant, to induce me, as a Representative from one of the smaller States, to vote for any alteration in the Constitution. It is the true interest of the smaller States, especially, to preserve sacred and untouched the Constitution, and not be weakening it by alterations—expecting temporary advantages that may or may never arise; and which, if attained, would be little—would be less than insignificant—compared with the infinite importance of this instrument to those States, as it stands at present. Their independence, nay, their very existence, as States, hangs upon their preservation of it. They could never get such another, and they should be the last to tamper with it: when they do so, they risk their only stake. And now let me entreat gentlemen representing the twelve smaller States in the Senate (for it is here, and here only, they are felt in the Government) to weigh well their amendments before, by their affirmative votes, they do an act that may encroach upon the Constitutional rights of those States. I know well that, with some of the States, it is the highest source of mortification that the Constitution has placed the larger and smaller ones so nearly upon an equality in certain respects. The pride of some of the larger States will, for instance, never submit that, by any possible contingency, the State of Delaware, of Rhode Island, of Vermont, or New Hampshire, should have an equal voice with them in the choice of a President, as in case of an election by the House of Representatives. This is an evil that must be cured; and if alterations shall prove insufficient, a more effectual remedy, I fear, will be prescribed, the moment that the national pulse can be prepared for the application.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

So far, Mr. President, as human wisdom, or rather human frailty, might be permitted to judge of the future from the past and the present, I should think it no act of rashness to foretell that the next alteration attempted, will be to destroy the influence of the smaller States in this branch of the Legislature, not directly by expunging that provision of the Constitution which gives to each State an equal representation upon this floor, for that cannot be done with the consent of every State, but indirectly in conformity with the idea of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) expressed the other day, by shortening the period for which Senators shall be elected, and which, in effect, will amount to the same thing. I know too well the weight and influence of the gentleman from Kentucky in this Government at present, to treat lightly what he says upon a subject of such magnitude, and must consider the charge of aristocracy, which he has been pleased to bring against the Senate as the denunciation of this body. Indeed, sir, I shall not be surprised to hear at the next session, that the people are prepared for the change, or even that some of the smaller States have recommended it, for such is at present the infatuated confidence of many of them in those who, I fear, are encompassing their ruin, that they seem to be constantly acting under instructions, and to have resigned both themselves and the Constitution to the guardianship of others. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAYLOR,) in order to lull our fears and divert our attention from the threat uttered by him to the smaller States, has very artfully called the alarm sounded on that subject by my honorable friend from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) at one time a stratagem, and at another an ambuscade; and asked, how he, as a general, could lay an ambuscade so unconcealed, so exposed to the enemy? Sir, we resort to no stratagems or ambuscades, our opposition is public, and our movements undisguised; and it was on the part of my friend only a prompt attack upon an ambuscade laid by the gentleman from Virginia himself, who has been entrusted with the chief command in this campaign, and which by him had been incautiously too soon uncovered; whilst gentler means succeed so well, threats are unnecessary, and might be dangerous. I was not a little surprised, Mr. President, to hear an honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) after reminding us that he belonged to a small State, come out on this occasion the mighty champion of the large ones, and whilst exhibiting himself to the greatest possible advantage in this new and enviable character, calling upon my friend from Massachusetts before me, (Mr. ADAMS,) to know why he, representing a large State, had been pleased to give himself any concern about the interests of the small States, intimating that such conduct concealed views not intended to be discovered, or, in the courtly language of the day, that it was stratagem; I wonder it had not been an ambuscade too. The honorable member from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) has prudently attempted to conceal again the ambuscade that had been so much annoyed by the fire of my friend from New Jersey, endeavoring to soften down and explain away an expression used by him, and which, by a very natural construction, was considered a threat to the smaller States; the gentleman has indeed told us since that he intended no threat, and we are bound to accept his explanation. I mean not to scrutinize his meaning, especially after what the honorable member has said; but let us see how far the gentleman from Maryland was correct, when he declared that his friend from Virginia had used no language that could amount to a threat to the smaller States. If, sir, the language, I will say the menacing language of the gentleman from Virginia used on this subject, taken according to its common import, was not sufficient to rally and unite the smaller States, then the rancor of party has stifled more noble sentiments, we are a house divided against itself, and our day has passed.

After reproaching us with our weakness, the gentleman proclaimed in the language of triumph, (for I will give his very words as noted down by myself and others at the time,) "Let the smaller States beware how they rouse the resentment of the larger ones. What," asked he, "must become of them in such a collision?" And is this no threat? Sir, I answer, we might sink; but it is to avoid this very collision that I resist, with my feeble efforts, the present measure. We are now safely entrenched behind the barriers of the Constitution, and shall we ourselves demolish this great bulwark of our defence? Shall we not rather make our stand here, whilst the means of protection and resistance are within our power? Ambition is insatiable; the more we give up the more will be demanded of us, and every inch of ground we yield, the less tenable does the rest become. The honorable member from Virginia has told us, that the present mode of electing the President and Vice President was the road to Monarchy. I have often, sir, heard it intimated, that the Government of the United States had a tendency to Monarchy, a doctrine I could never accede to. (I mean as the Government is at present organized.) I speak and judge from things as they now present themselves; what effect these many speculative changes that are at present taking place in the Constitution may have, I know not, I presume not to foretell. But one thing was, years since, foretold and denied, and I now call it up to the recollection of gentlemen on the other side of the House, not to upbraid or offend them—but short-sighted man feels a kind of pleasure, (it is indeed though, Mr. President, on this occasion a melancholy one,) in having foretold truly the events of futurity. It was foretold that the Constitution would not suit those who were coming into power; that it was obnoxious to them, or to their leaders, which is in effect the same, and that the moment they should lay their hands upon it, if they could not get rid of it entirely under the pretence of amending and altering, they would fritter it away, until but the shadow, the empty shadow, should remain. How far the proceedings of this session, which is the first that the present majority ever consisted of two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature, will go to justify this prediction, I will leave the world and the consciences of those honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House to judge. But such was the anxiety on this subject, that scarcely had we convened before the long wished for, hallowed work, was commenced, and the order of almost every day since has been a resolution to alter the Constitution. If, sir, the Constitution was suffered to remain as it is, I have no idea, from my acquaintance with the people of this country, and from the nature of our civil institutions, that any set of men, entrusted with the management of our public affairs, could ever, by a system of measures tending to such an end, succeed in the subversion of our rights and liberties. The people watch their servants with a jealous eye. If they err at all, it is on this side, and this is the safe side. No, Mr. President, what we have most to fear to our Government, and our liberties, must come from another and a very different source, from the licentiousness of democracy. This is what Republican Governments have forever to guard against; this is the vortex in which they are most likely to be swallowed up. God grant it may never be the case with ours, and I fear nothing else. By the licentiousness of democracy, I mean no imputation or offence to any portion of this community; I refer not to the political sentiments of any honorable gentlemen, or to the sentiments of their constituents—but to that wild infuriated spirit that we have seen in France, under the prostituted name of liberty, anarchizing the world, and rioting in the destruction of everything dear and valuable to society; and after having sported itself in all the wantonness of excess with the terrors, the crimes, the miseries and the murders of mankind, has seated a Corsican adventurer upon the high and dignified throne of the Bourbons—has riveted the manacles of tyranny upon a great, a brave, but a deluded people, and is now reclining in the shade of a military despotism.

Mr. COCKE.—The gentleman last up has, to be sure, in a well studied speech, as often times before, sounded the tocsin of alarm, and called in even the aid of prophecy to enforce his fears. But, sir, this Senate has been so much accustomed to these false alarms, that it appears to me the only danger we are in is that of going wide of the subject, and taking up our time with matters of imagination, instead of sticking to matter of fact. The object of this amendment to the Constitution is only one thing, one plain and simple principle, to enable the people to discriminate in the choice of their fellow-citizens for the offices of President and Vice President. Gentlemen tell us of large and small States, but is this amendment more in favor of the large than small; is this not such an amendment as will induce the large States to promote the election by the people? Is it not such an amendment as will prevent that corruption which so many gentlemen on all sides apprehend, if it goes into the House of Representatives? Where is the use of gentlemen sounding an alarm of danger which they do not really believe themselves? Why will gentlemen talk of the danger of confusion—threaten us with it, when the whole confusion arises from the acts of gentlemen themselves? We have listened here with patience for weeks together to the arguments of gentlemen; they have had every fair opportunity to give their opinions, and it is now time to come to a conclusive vote. We hear nothing now but a repetition in fine dressed words of what we have heard from day to day for weeks; and for what purpose? to excite our fears, fears which it is our wish to guard against in reality.

Gentlemen tell us, first, they suppose the people may not elect a President and Vice President. Upon what ground do they pretend to believe this possible? Are the people so disgusted with their liberties; are they so little attentive to their rights—are they tired of a Government that every day makes them more happy? No, sir.

They then tell us that they do not wish that the election should go into the House of Representatives; and then that that House may not elect; and then our very honorable selves are recommended to make up all deficiencies! Do gentlemen doubt themselves, or can they compel Congress to pass such a law as they require for the election of a dictator, without a voice from the people? If gentlemen fear that the people will not elect, and that the other House will not elect, with equal reason they may fear that the other House would not make the law they wish for.

But it is said that some of us are governed by a fear that the people may not have a choice in the election of Vice President. If it will afford gentlemen any satisfaction, I tell them that it is my wish that the people should elect the Vice President as well as the President. I say, I do not understand the principle of minorities governing majorities. The law of the minority is not the law of the Constitution, and it is not the law for me. How gentlemen can pretend to advocate the Constitution, and talk of the minority giving law, is to me very surprising; they say too the Constitution is very sacred to them, and it should not be altered; so it is too, every word, sacred to me; but among its most sacred parts, I find that the Constitution provides for its own alteration and amendment; not indeed by a minority, but by a large majority in both Houses, and by a much larger majority of States. Gentlemen are not willing that a majority should elect a Vice President, but they are not willing that three-fourths of the States should amend the Constitution; they pass by the open door on the right hand to get in at a private passage.

Mr. WHITE—to order—the gentleman is not surely using any arguments of mine; they are of his own making.

Mr. COCKE.—The gentleman from Delaware thinks the minority should govern—that is his argument, however he may disguise it. I think the majority should govern; I like to speak out—I do not wish to have a man put upon us contrary to our wishes. What! shall the majority abandon the right of choosing a man whose opinions are conformable to theirs, and suffer a man of principles hostile to theirs to be put upon them? I am, sir, for a government of the people, whether well born or born by accident; I am for a government not of checks and balances, but one that will not suffer a bad check upon good principles.

But we are once more told of a Gallic Cæsar, and our fears are to be provoked this way too—but this more than the rest of alarms will not do; we fear no Cæsar, foreign or domestic. We have indeed seen the day when we were near getting a President not of our choice; but because we have escaped from the danger and the intrigue of that day, are we to take no precaution against such measures again. It is to guard against such danger we wish to amend this Constitution. But gentlemen tell us we have not given it a fair trial. I think we have, and found it defective. Here we have been a week and upwards, laboring and bewildered in every kind of discussion, and what have we come to? exactly where we set out. Not one of us has altered our opinions—we have argued and listened and done nothing. Why? Because gentlemen have been attempting impossibilities; there is no such thing as moving either side from their principles. One side thinks the minority should give the law; we think with the Constitution the right is in the majority, and we will submit to no other law. I am for the amendment, and for a discrimination.

Mr. PLUMER said that he had generally contented himself with expressing his opinion by a silent vote, but on a question which affected the rights of the smaller States, (one of which he had the honor to represent,) he requested the indulgence of the Senate to a few observations.

He said the Constitution had provided only two methods for obtaining amendments, and both are granted with great caution. If two-thirds of the several State Legislatures apply, Congress shall call a convention who are to propose amendments, which, when ratified by the conventions of three-fourths of the States, will be valid. If this mode is adopted, Congress have nothing to do but to ascertain the fact, whether the necessary number of States require a convention. If they do, a convention must be called. The State Legislatures are only to apply for a convention. They can neither propose nor decide the amendments.

The other mode is, if two-thirds of both Houses of Congress deem it necessary to propose amendments, and three-fourths of the State Legislatures ratify them, they are valid. This is the present mode. The State Legislatures have nothing to do till after Congress has proposed the amendments, and then it is their exclusive province either to ratify or reject them. But they have no authority to direct or even request Congress to propose particular amendments for themselves to ratify. Instructions on this subject are therefore improper. It is an assumption of power, not the exercise of a right. It is an attempt to create an undue influence over Congress. It is prejudging the question before it is proposed by the only authority that has the Constitutional right to move it. If these instructions are obligatory, our votes must be governed, not by the convictions of our own judgments, or the propriety and fitness of the measure, but by the mandates of other Legislatures. This would destroy one of the checks that the Constitution has provided against innovation. State Legislatures may, on some subjects, instruct their Senators; but on this, their instructions ought not to influence, much less bind us, to propose amendments, unless we ourselves deem them necessary.

The Senate consists of two members from each State; and in this case, the concurrence of two-thirds of all the Senate are necessary. A majority of the Senate constitutes a quorum to do business, but that quorum is a majority of all the Senators that all the States are entitled to elect. This applies with equal force to the term "two-thirds of the Senate." But in cases where from necessity a speedy decision is requisite, and where the concurrence of two-thirds is required, the Constitution is explicit in confining that two-thirds to the members present; as in cases of treaties and impeachments; and also a fifth of the members present requesting the yeas and nays. If amendments can be Constitutionally proposed by two-thirds of the Senate present, it will follow that twelve Senators, when only a quorum is present, may propose them against the will of twenty-two Senators.

Mr. P. observed, that he had said the Constitution had provided for amendments, but with great caution. In some cases, they cannot, in the nature of things, be ever made. For instance, the equal representation of each State in the Senate cannot be abridged without its own consent. Other parts of the Constitution cannot be amended till after a certain period, to wit: those relating to slaves, and the apportionment of direct taxes. The United States are bound to guarantee to each State a Republican form of government, and to protect each against invasion. Can these stipulations be expunged? They cannot. Because a change here would introduce new principles into the Constitution. That instrument is a compact formed by each individual State with the United States, and it may be difficult to ascertain how far a new principle, introduced into the Constitution, would operate as releasing the dissenting States from the compact. Nothing but imperious necessity can justify the introduction of new principles. The specious term of "amendments," will be falsified by applying it to forms and proceedings, without extending it to the principles and substance of the Constitution.

In an elective government much depends upon public opinion. It is important that the Constitution should be stable and permanent as the standard to direct that opinion. A Constitution frequently changed, cannot command the esteem or veneration of any people. The proposing of amendments has a tendency to infuse a spirit of fickleness and love of novelty into the public mind. One change prepares the way for another. How many constitutions have there, within a few years, been established in France, each of which was thought better than the one that preceded it? Have not their frequent changes rendered everything dear to man so precarious and uncertain, as to induce them to establish a military despotism, in preference to a free Government? Their fate should serve as a solemn warning to us not to change our Constitution, unless compelled by absolute necessity.

It has been said, the people require this amendment; but of this fact we have no evidence.

This amendment affects the relative interest and importance of the smaller States. The Constitution requires the Electors of each State to vote for two men, one of whom to be President of the United States. This affords a degree of security to the small States against the views and ambition of the large States. It gives them weight and influence in the choice. By destroying this complex mode of choice, and introducing the simple principle of designation, the large States can with more ease elect their candidate. This amendment will enable the Electors from four States and a half to choose a President, against the will of the remaining twelve States and a half. Can such a change tend to conciliate and strengthen the Union?

This amendment has a tendency to render the Vice President less respectable. He will be voted for not as President of the United States, but as President of the Senate, elected to preside over forms in this House. In electing a subordinate officer the Electors will not require those qualifications requisite for supreme command. The office of Vice President will be a sinecure. It will be brought to market and exposed to sale to procure votes for the President. Will the ambitious, aspiring candidate for the Presidency, will his friends and favorites promote the election of a man of talents, probity, and popularity for Vice President, and who may prove his rival? No! They will seek a man of moderate talents, whose ambition is bounded by that office, and whose influence will aid them in electing the President. This mode of election is calculated to increase corruption, promote intrigue, and aid inordinate ambition. The Vice President will be selected from some of the large States; he will have a casting vote in this House; and feeble indeed must his talents be, if his influence will not be equal to that of a member. This will, in fact, be giving to that State a third Senator.

In the Southern States the blacks are considered as property, and the States in which they live are thereby entitled to eighteen additional Electors and Representatives. A number equal to all the Electors and Representatives that four States and a half are entitled to elect. Will you, by this amendment, lessen the weight and influence of the Eastern States in the election of your first officers, and still retain this unequal article in your Constitution? Shall property in one part of the Union give an increase of Electors, and be wholly excluded in other States? Can this be right? Will it strengthen the Union?

This amendment is designed to prevent the evils that occurred at the last Presidential election. That was an extraordinary event; it was a casualty that can seldom happen. Two men had a majority of all the electoral votes, but neither of them was chosen. But what was the consequence? Why, the House of Representatives in a peaceable manner completed the choice, and that, fourteen days before the President could enter upon the duties of his office. It may be desirable to prevent the choice being carried into the House of Representatives, but this amendment will not do it. It expressly provides for such an event. And if two or more candidates of different parties are carried there, (and if the state of parties should be nearly equal it will happen,) the House must then decide between candidates of different parties.

Mr. P. said that the amendment appeared calculated to give power to the strong; enfeeble and weaken the small States; to lessen the respectability of the Vice President, and not to prevent the evil it was designed to remedy; and therefore that he should vote against it.

Mr. JACKSON.—The gentleman last up and another who had preceded him (Messrs. WHITE and PLEMER) had taken a ground which he did not expect to hear in the elective Senate of a free people. They questioned not only the propriety of the present amendment but of all amendments. This he considered as of no great consequence, but he thought it merited notice, because the dislike of amendments is expressed by gentlemen who wish to have it believed that they are more strongly attached to the Constitution than others; and though the Constitution which they so ardently admire provides expressly for its own amendment. Gentlemen liked the Constitution, but they disliked all amendment, forgetting that as long as human society exists, it must be subject to human frailties; nothing that comes from the head of man can be perfect; and though we may fail to correct imperfections in human institutions, it is our duty to persevere and employ every means which time and experience point out to us, to render our state as secure from evil as possible.

Why is it that gentlemen constantly refer us to France? Do gentlemen, by referring us to that unfortunate country, expect to impress a belief on us that there is any resemblance of situation or circumstances between the two countries?—or are they so blind as not to see that the state of liberty in that country should be a most earnest motive with us to provide such amendments to our Constitution as may secure us against the danger of usurpation? Our situation has never resembled that of France, but during our Revolution. That nation had not the opportunity of sitting down after the overthrow of her enemies, and forming a free constitution in peace, as we had. It was in the conflicts of faction excited by foreign enemies, that the state of France was changed; but she had been always different from us. France was always one and indivisible. In that country we have seen the conflicts of faction, and the frantic zeal of adherents convulsing the nation; have we not had any similar transactions during our own Revolution? Were there no factions even in our Revolutionary councils? Have we had no ambitious men since seeking to destroy our liberties? Are there none now who would, if they could hope for success, attempt it? Thanks to our better fortune, though we have encountered many a storm, and though bad pilots had nearly foundered us, the vessel of State is still safe, and her liberties are not gone by the board. Thanks to the sound sense of the people, unbounded thanks to the able pilot who now holds the helm, we have escaped a wreck, and are now more prosperous and happy than at any former period. The exalted character who is now at the head of affairs defies the shallow railings and little-minded attacks of his enemies; his character stands too high above their reach to be affected by the insects that crawl beneath him; his conduct is above their censure, and his good deeds have rendered him dear to his fellow-citizens. His countrymen had fixed their eyes upon him, but arts had been employed to frustrate their wishes. The effect, however, had been fortunate; and if it had not been for accidental circumstances, there never would have been room for the alarming contest which took place in the House of Representatives. He had the best reason to know, that it never was intended to make any other man President. He was at that period at the head of the government of Georgia, and happened to be present when a letter was received, directed to some of the Electors, the contents of which were communicated to him. The Electors of Georgia had determined to give two of their votes to Governor Clinton. The letter was from an influential gentleman in South Carolina, pressing them to give all their votes equal, as it was alleged that if they were not given, a character not acceptable to the people would be Vice President. It was therefore to secure for Mr. Burr the Vice Presidency that those two votes were given, which would not have been given if the least suspicion had been entertained of what subsequently happened.

But it is asserted that there may be a coalition of the large States, and thus this amendment is intended to depress the small States. These things gentlemen said only because they could say nothing to the purpose. Will any gentleman say that Massachusetts and Virginia have united? Look to their representatives, and ask them if such is the case. Will those States be ever likely to coalesce in party views? Never; there is one point only upon which they could be united—the defence of a common country. Tear a leaf from the Constitution and they will rally together, and the small States will cling around them.

But why is this jealousy of Virginia excited—when and where has she domineered over her sister States? She is as incapable of the attempt as of submission to an insulting and insidious domination. From whence do you derive your Constitution? From Virginia. When your small States refused to submit to a paltry five per cent. impost on foreign goods, what was then your situation? Whostood forward? Virginia; she saw the situation of their common country, she saw the glories of the Revolution and the liberties of the people endangered by the blind and selfish policy of the small States; and she with her accustomed sagacity found out the remedy, by proposing a convention, in which your Constitution originated.

To whom are you indebted for the Revolution! To the brave State of Massachusetts, the gratitude of America is due for her valor, her constancy, and her sufferings. But it is to Virginia you owe the instructive spirit and the manful determination of the first resolve and first determination to be free, sovereign, and independent. Why then is this jealousy attempted? Is it because she had given us Washington in our Revolution, and Jefferson now? Is it to the superiority of her patriots and statesmen we must attribute this unworthy envy? It has been asked why we do not resort to a convention, if we wish to amend the Constitution? For his part he was averse to calling conventions, but when no other remedy was provided; bodies of that description are invested with boundless power; the physical and political powers of the State are in their hands; and they are therefore more exposed to the zeal and the intrigues of the ardent and ambitious. The Constitution has provided means more simple, and fully adequate; and, even though we might err in our determinations, the check of three-fourths of the Legislatures will be an adequate protection against the invasion of the public rights.

We are told we shall give up everything if we pass this amendment. Shall we, really, have more or less power than before; or, has there been any coalition which is under an apprehension of losing everything by its passage?

We are told that the candidates, on a former occasion, had an equal claim and equal pretensions to the office of President. He did not wish to make comparisons; but he could not but recollect that the attempt to supersede one of the candidates, and to place the other in his station, had endangered the Government; and, from what he had already said, he believed it would not be questioned that, so far as concerned Georgia, it never was intended to give them an equal chance; and small and obscure as that little corner called Georgia is, had the measure been pursued to consummation, which had been attempted on that occasion, she would have flown to arms, and South Carolina would have joined her to do justice to the interest of the nation.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) had talked of intrigues. The days of intrigue are past, they are gone, and the intriguers with them; the people have got the man of their choice; Mr. Jefferson has no occasion for intrigue were he disposed to employ it; the Administration has none; the policy of the Executive is above all intrigues; the affections of the people are his, and justly, for, under his Administration, they are the happiest people that ever existed. Never will there be a Federal President or Vice President again elected, to the end of time; if there should ever be any other chosen out of the line of the present politics, it must be from some new sect, which, assuming the principles of the republicans, may succeed by carrying their zeal for liberty farther.

He did not wish to discuss largely the allusion of the gentleman to a fifth wheel. Were the subject to be confined to our own country, he should go fully into that subject; he wished not to afford any handle for the disrespect of foreign nations towards any part of our institutions. But he would spurn the insinuations of those who would suggest that we shall not choose a man of integrity for the office of Vice President. The people, sir, will solicit a man worthy of their confidence, and honored abroad and at home.

The amendment to the Constitution, he considered necessary and salutary; and he was in hopes, when gentlemen saw the benefits, they would come forward and thank us for it.

Mr. TRACY hoped the Senate would now adjourn; on the question being put, it was lost.

The motion of Mr. TRACY for an adjournment having been negatived, he then addressed the President.

Mr. TRACY moved an adjournment, because he thought a more full and fair discussion was due to this important question than could be had after this late hour.

The merits have never, until now, been before us, for, although considerable time has been consumed in debate, it has chiefly been directed to the subordinate amendments, and not to the main resolution. But, since the Senate have refused to adjourn, I will now offer some observations on the merits; in doing which, I will study brevity, as much as the importance of the subject will permit.

I shall attempt to prove, sir, that the resolution before us contains principles which have a manifest tendency to deprive the small States of an important right, secured to them by a solemn and Constitutional compact, and to vest an overwhelming power in the great States. And, further, I shall attempt to show that, in many other points, the resolution is objectionable, and, for a variety of causes, ought not to be adopted.

As I shall be obliged, in delineating the main features of this resolution, to mention the great States in the Union as objects of jealousy, I wish it to be understood that no special stigma is intended. "Man is man," was the maxim expressed in an early part of this debate, by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. BUTLER,) and in application to the subject of Government, the maxim is worthy to be written in letters of gold. Yes, sir, "man is man," and the melancholy truth that he is always imperfect and frequently wicked, induces us to fear his power, and guard against his rapacity, by the establishment and preservation of laws, and well-regulated constitutions of Government. Man, when connected with very many of his fellow men, in a great State, derives power from the circumstance of this numerous combination; and from every circumstance which clothes him with additional power, he will generally derive some additional force to his passions.

Having premised this, I shall not deem it requisite to make any apology, when I attempt to excite the attention, the vigilance, and even the jealousy of the small, in reference to the conduct of the great States. The caution is meant to apply against the imperfections and passions of man, generally, and not against any State, or description of men, particularly.

It may be proper, in this place, to explain my meaning, when I make use of the words "small" and "great," as applicable to States.

Massachusetts has been usually called a great State; but, in respect to all the operations of this resolution, she must, I think, be ranked among the small States. The district of Maine is increasing rapidly, and must, in the nature of things, soon become a State. To which event, its location, being divided from what was the ancient Colony of Massachusetts, by the intervention of New Hampshire, will very much contribute. I believe there is a Legislative provision of some years' standing, authorizing a division at the option of Maine. When this event shall occur, Massachusetts, although, in comparison with Connecticut and Rhode Island, will not be a small State; yet, in comparison with many others, must be so considered. I think myself justifiable, then, for my present purposes, in calling Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina, small States. They are limited in point of territory, and cannot reasonably expect any great increase of population for many years, not, indeed, until the other States shall become so populous as to discourage emigration, with agricultural views; which may retain the population of the small States as seamen or manufacturers. This event, if it ever arrives, must be distant. A possible exception only may exist in favor of Maine; but, when we consider its climate, and a variety of other circumstances, it is believed to form no solid exception to this statement.

By the same rule of deciding, the residue of the States must be called great; for although Georgia and several others are not sufficiently populous, at this time, to be considered relatively great States, yet their prospect of increase, with other circumstances, fairly bring them within the description, in respect to the operation of the measure now under consideration.

It will be recollected that, in the various turns which the debate has taken, gentlemen have repeatedly said that the Constitution was formed for the people; that the good of the whole was its object; that nothing was discernible in it like a contest of States, nothing like jealousy of small States against the great; and although such distinctions and jealousies might have existed under the first Confederation, yet they could have no existence under the last. And one gentleman, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,) has said that he has been a member of this Government ten years, and has heard nothing of great and small States, as in the least affecting the operations of Government, or the feelings of those who administer it.

Propriety, therefore, requires that we attentively examine the Constitution itself, not only to obtain correct ideas upon these observations, so repeatedly urged, but to place in the proper light the operations and effects of the resolution in debate. If we attend to the Constitution, we shall immediately find evident marks of concession and compromise, and that the parties to these concessions were the great and small States. And the members of the Convention who formed the instrument have, in private information and public communications, united in the declaration, that the Constitution was the result of concession and compromise between the great and small States. In this examination of the Constitution it will be impossible to keep out of view our political relations under the first Confederation. We primarily united upon the footing of complete State equality—each State had one, and no State had more than one vote in the Federal Council or Congress. With such a Confederation we successfully waged war, and became an independent nation. When we were relieved from the pressure of war, that Confederation, both in structure and power, was found inadequate to the purposes for which it was established. Under these circumstances, the States, by their Convention, entered into a new agreement, upon principles better adapted to promote their mutual security and happiness. But this last agreement, or Constitution, under which we are now united, was manifestly carved out of the first Confederation. The small States adhered tenaciously to the principles of State equality; and gave up only a part of that federative principle, complete State equality, and that, with evident caution and reluctance. To this federative principle they were attached by habit; and their attachment was sanctioned and corroborated by the example of most if not all the ancient and the modern Confederacies. And when the great States claimed a weight in the Councils of the nation proportionate to their numbers and wealth, the novelty of the claim, as well as its obvious tendency to reduce the sovereignty of the small States, must have produced serious obstacles to its admission. Hence it is, that we find in the Constitution but one entire departure from the Federal principle. The House of Representatives is established upon the popular principle, and given to numbers and wealth, or to the great States, which, in this view of the subject, are synonymous. It was thought, by the Convention, that a consolidation of the States into one simple Republic, would be improper. And the local feelings and jealousies of all, but more especially of the small States, rendered a consolidation impracticable.

The Senate, who have the power of a legislative check upon the House of Representatives, and many other extensive and important powers, is preserved as an entire federative feature of Government as it was enjoyed by the small States, under the first Confederacy.

In the article which obliges the Electors of President to vote for one person not an inhabitant of the same State with themselves, is discovered State jealousy. In the majorities required for many purposes by the Constitution, although there were other motives for the regulations, yet the jealousy of the small States is clearly discernible. Indeed, sir, if we peruse the Constitution with attention, we shall find the small States are perpetually guarding the federative principle, that is, State equality. And this, in every part of it, except in the choice of the House of Representatives, and in their ordinary legislative proceedings. They go so far as to prohibit any amendment which may affect the equality of States in the Senate.

This is guarding against almost an impossibility, because the Senators of small States must be criminally remiss in their attendance, and the Legislatures extremely off their guard, if they permit such alterations, which aim at their own existence. But, lest some accident, some unaccountable blindness or perfidy should put in jeopardy the federative principle in the Senate, they totally and forever prohibit all attempts at such a measure. In the choice of President, the mutual caution and concession of the great and small States, is, if possible, more conspicuous than in any other part of the Constitution.

He is to be chosen by Electors appointed as the State Legislatures shall direct, not according to numbers entirely, but adding two Electors in each State as representatives of State sovereignty. Thus Delaware obtains three votes for President, whereas she could have but one in right of numbers. Yet, mixed as this mode of choice is, with both popular and federative principles, we see the small States watching its motions and circumscribing it to one attempt only, and, on failure of an Electoral choice, they instantly seize upon the right of a Federal election, and select from the candidates a President by States and not by numbers. In confirmation of my assertion, that this part of the Constitution was peculiarly the effect of compromise between the great and small States, permit me to quote an authority which will certainly have great weight, not only in the Senate, but through the Union, I mean that of the present Secretary of State, (Mr. Madison,) who was a leading member of the Federal Convention who formed, and of the Virginia Convention who adopted the Constitution.

In the Debates of the Virginia Convention, volume 3, page 77, Mr. Madison says, speaking of the mode of electing the President:

“As to the eventual voting by States it has my approbation. The lesser States and some larger States will be generally pleased by that mode. The Deputies from the small States argued, and there is some force in their reasoning, that, when the people voted, the large States evidently had the advantage over the rest, and, without varying the mode, the interests of the little States might be neglected or sacrificed. Here is a compromise. For in the eventual election, the small States will have the advantage.”

After this view of the Constitution, let us inquire, what is the direct object of the proposed alteration in the choice of President?

To render more practicable and certain the choice by Electors—and for this reason: that the people at large, or in other words, that the great States, ought to have more weight and influence in the choice. That it should be brought nearer to the popular and carried further from the federative principle. This claim we find was made at the formation of the Constitution. The great States naturally wished for a popular choice of First Magistrate. This mode was sanctioned by the example of many of the States in the choice of Governor. The small States claimed a choice on the federative principle, by the Legislatures, and to vote by States; analogies and examples were not wanting to sanction this mode of election. A consideration of the weight and influence of a President of this Union, must have multiplied the difficulties of agreeing upon the mode of choice. But as I have before said, by mutual concession, they agreed upon the present mode, combining both principles and dividing between the two parties, thus mutually jealous, as they could, this important privilege of electing a Chief Magistrate.

This mode then became established, and the right of the small States to elect upon the federative principle, or by States, in case of contingency of electoral failure of choice, cannot with reason and fairness be taken from them, without their consent, and on a full understanding of its operation; since it was meant to be secured to them by the Constitution, and was one of the terms upon which they became members of the present Confederacy; and for which privilege they gave an equivalent to the great States, in sacrificing so much of the federative principle, or State equality.

The Constitution is nicely balanced, with the federative and popular principles; the Senate are the guardians of the former, and the House of Representatives of the latter; and any attempts to destroy this balance, under whatever specious names or pretences they may be presented, should be watched with a jealous eye. Perhaps a fair definition of the Constitutional powers of amending is, that you may upon experiment so modify the Constitution in its practice and operation, as to give it, upon its own principles, a more complete effect. But this is an attack upon a fundamental principle established after a long deliberation, and by mutual concession, a principle of essential importance to the instrument itself, and an attempt to wrest from the small States a vested right, and, by it, to increase the power and influence of the large States. I shall not pretend, sir, that the parties to this Constitutional compact cannot alter its original essential principles, and that such alterations may not be effected under the name of amendment; but, let a proposal of that kind come forward in its own proper and undisguised shape; let it be fairly stated to Congress, to the State Legislatures, to the people at large, that the intention is to change an important federative feature in the Constitution, which change in itself and all its consequences, will tend to a consolidation of this Union into a simple Republic; let it be fairly stated, that the small States have too much agency in the important article of electing a Chief Magistrate, and that the great States claim the choice; and we shall then have a fair decision. If the Senators of the small States, and if their State Legislatures, will then quietly part with the right they have, no person can reasonably complain.

Nothing can be more obvious, than the intention of the plan adopted by our Constitution for choosing a President. The Electors are to nominate two persons, of whom they cannot know which will be President; this circumstance not only induces them to select both from the best men; but gives a direct advantage into the hands of the small States even in the electoral choice. For they can always select from the two candidates set up by the Electors of large States, by throwing their votes upon their favorite, and of course giving him a majority; or, if the Electors of the large States should, to prevent this effect, scatter their votes, for one candidate, then the Electors of the small States would have it in their power to elect a Vice President. So that, in any event, the small States will have a considerable agency in the election. But if the discriminating or designating principle is carried, as contained in this resolution, the whole, or nearly the whole right and agency of the small States, in the electoral choice of Chief Magistrate, is destroyed, and their chance of obtaining a federative choice by States if not destroyed, is very much diminished.

For this identical purpose is the principle of electoral discrimination and designation introduced into the resolution before you; for the same purpose is the number of candidates reduced from five to three, from whom the House of Representatives may elect, in case of electoral failure of choice; that is, to destroy or diminish the agency of the small States in the choice of President.

For what purpose else are we perpetually told, and from all parts of the Senate, that the public will is opposed by the present mode, and public will cannot be gratified, without the introduction of the discriminating principle?

By the public will thus mentioned, the gentlemen mean the will of a popular majority, or, the will of the great States, which in this case, I repeat it, are the same. How is it possible for the gentlemen to increase the chances of gratifying this description of the public will, without decreasing the agency of the small States?

The whole power of election is now vested in the two parties; numbers and States, or, great and small States; and it is demonstration itself, if you increase the power of the one, in just such proportion you diminish that of the other. Do the gentlemen suppose that the public will, when Constitutionally expressed by a majority of States, in pursuance of the federative principle of our Government, is of less validity, or less binding upon the community at large, than the public will expressed by a popular majority? The framers of your Constitution, the people who adopted it, meant, that the public will, in the choice of a President, should be expressed by Electors, if they could agree, and if not, the public will should be expressed by a majority of the States, acting in their federative capacity, and that in both cases the expression of the public will should be equally binding.

It is pretended that the public will can never, properly or Constitutionally, be expressed by a majority of numbers of the people, or of the

SENATE.

House of Representatives. This may be a pleasing doctrine enough to great States; but it is certainly incorrect. Our Constitution has given the expression of the public will, in a variety of instances, other than that of the choice of President, into very different hands from either House of Representatives or the people at large. The President and Senate, and in many cases the President alone, can express the public will, in appointments of high trust and responsibility, and it cannot be forgotten that the President sometimes expresses the public will by removals. Treaties, highly important expressions of the public will, are made by the President and Senate; and they are the supreme law of the land. In the several States, many great offices are filled, and even the Chief Magistracy, by various modes of election. The public will is sometimes expressed by pluralities instead of majorities, sometimes by both branches of the Legislatures, and sometimes by one, and in certain contingencies, elections are settled by lot. The people have adopted constitutions containing such regulations, and experience has proved that they are well calculated to preserve their liberties and promote their happiness. From what good or even pardonable motive, then, can it be urged that the present mode of electing our President has a tendency to counteract the public will? Do gentlemen intend to destroy every federal feature in this Constitution? And is this resolution a precursor to a complete consolidation of the Union, and to the establishment of a simple Republic?—Or will it suffice to break down every federative feature which secures to one portion of the Union, to the small States, their rights?

I am not without my fears, Mr. President, that this is but the beginning of evils, and that this Constitution, the bulwark of the feeble members of the Confederacy; the protection of the weak against the strong; the security of the small against the great; the last, best hope of man, with a view to stability in a free Government, and to the preservation of liberty in a Republic; is destined to undergo changes, and suffer innovations, till there be no residue worth preserving, and nothing left which ambition will condescend to overturn.

Time will not permit me to dwell any longer on this part of my argument. But I am deceived, sir, if the view I have now taken of the Constitution does not show most obviously, that in its formation there was a struggle between the great and small States, with respect to many of its principles and leading features; and that the participation in the election of the Chief Magistrate, clearly secured to them by the Constitution, will receive a deadly blow by the adoption of the proposed amendment.

It can be no contradiction to my ideas upon the subject, if we have heard nothing of State conflicts, in the administration of this Government. The great States have never, till now, directly attempted to violate the sanctuary of the small, and despoil them of their rights; had this been earlier attempted, we should have heard and seen the same jealousy awakened, and the same opposition exerted.

The conflict could happen in no other way than by an attack from the large States. We had neither the desire nor ability to injure them, and we now ask no favors, but their permission to enjoy, in peace and safety, the rights conceded to us by themselves, and secured by a solemn Constitutional compact.

We have been told by a gentleman from Virginia, that it would be impolitic in us to rouse the great States. I shall, at present, take no further notice of this warning, given to us, no doubt, in the full exercise of benevolence, but to request the small States to preserve it in constant recollection. It may induce them not hastily to part with Constitutional security.

There are some other points of light, in which I wish to place the subject before us.

The Constitution is of recent date; it was formed by the mutual concessions of conflicting parties, and balanced with a view to the securing of all. Experience alone can test its utility, and time and practice discover its faults. It is a sound position that you should never attempt an alteration in an instrument so complicated, and calculated to serve so many various and opposite interests, without being able, by the test of experiment, to discern clearly the necessity of alteration, and without a moral certainty that the change shall not only remove an existing evil, but that it shall not produce any itself. The article in the Constitution establishing the mode of electing a Chief Magistrate, and which is now proposed to be altered, was undoubtedly one of the most difficult parts of the whole at its formation. I am convinced, sir, that the public mind is not sufficiently impressed with the difficulty of adopting, not only an unexceptionable but even a tolerable and practicable mode of electing a Chief Magistrate, possessing such important and extensive powers as are Constitutionally vested in the President of the United States. An attempt to detail the number and magnitude of his powers, to this Senate, would be impertinent. But it must and will be acknowledged by all, that the President is vested with powers vastly extensive and important, and that he will bring with him into the Government more or less of State politics and State prejudices, and these facts, to which may be added the probability that he will be taken from a large State, must have increased the difficulties of the Convention in fixing on a mode of choice.

How often have contests, wars, and bloodshed, the destruction of confederacies, of liberty, and of vast portions of the human race, arisen from the election of Chief Magistrates? When we consider that the powers vested in the President of this Union are sufficiently important to excite the avarice and ambition of the human heart, its two most active principles, to gain possession of the office; when we consider the difference of sentiment, habit, and interest, in this country; State pride and State jealousy, which could never be laid asleep; the difficulties of fixing upon a proper mode of election must be also infinitely multiplied. And yet this article is now selected for alteration. All the amendments which have been hitherto adopted, went to some general explanation upon very general principles, not changing but rather expounding the Constitution.

SENATE.

Amendment to the Constitution.

DECEMBER, 1803.

This, as I have before said, is taking up the most difficult and most important article in the Constitution, both in relation to rights and principles. But it is said that experience has shown us the necessity of an alteration in this article; that an evil has been found in practice to grow out of the Constitutional provision, which calls imperiously for remedy.

At the last election of President two persons had an equal number of votes, and that number was a majority of the votes of all the Electors appointed, which circumstance gave the House of Representatives a Constitutional right to select one of them for President. In exercising this Constitutional right, they voted by States, and there was at first a division, no choice being made until the sixth day; when an election was effected, of the very man whom the great States, and the advocates of this resolution, wished.

It ought to be noted here, that although they voted by States, yet it happened, in this division, that a majority, in point of numbers, voted for the person as President who eventually became Vice President. As to intrigue, by either of the candidates, or by their friends, I know of none; the sentiments and conduct of the Vice President, as published, were perfectly fair and honorable, containing a declaration of his wishes not to stand in the way of the other candidate.

After the view of the Constitution which we have taken, and comparing this fact, or set of facts, with the provisions for electing a President, we shall really be at a loss to find out the mighty evil, which the experience of this election has discovered, and which is said to call so imperiously for a remedy. But the advocates of this resolution have had the goodness to put their finger on the spot. They say, that in the certificates of the Electors, Mr. Jefferson's name stood first; this is called a sort of record testimony, and, in addition, some, if not all the Electors said they meant to elect Mr. Jefferson President, and Mr. Burr Vice President; and this is declared to be the public will, expressed by the Constitutional organ, the Electors. Notwithstanding this expression of the public will, say the gentlemen, a large portion of the House of Representatives withstood and opposed the public will for the space of six days, and wilfully voted for the man to be President, who, they knew by the evidence just mentioned, was meant to be Vice President. One gentleman (Mr. WRIGHT) has said, that if he had been a member of that House, possessing such sentiments upon the subject as he now does, such voting would in him have amounted to the crime of perjury, or words to the same effect. I mean to quote his ideas, as expressed, and believe I have given nearly his very words. And, it is added, that thus there was imminent danger of a person being imposed upon the United States as Chief Magistrate, who was not originally intended for that high office, and that civil war must have been the consequence; and, as is common in such cases, the picture is filled—in the back ground, with brother raising his murderous hand against brother, father against son, and with an afflicting group of et ceteras; and to avoid a repetition of this tremendous crisis, as it is called, the present resolution, it is said, must pass.

Let this statement of facts be kept in view while we examine the duties assigned by the Constitution to the several agents concerned. The duty of the Electors is precisely defined. They are each to bring forward two candidates fully qualified for President, because they cannot know at the time of giving their ballots upon which the choice will fall. The circumstance of two having a majority, and both being equal in number of votes, is an expression of the public will, through the only Constitutional organ, by which, in this case, the public will can be expressed, that both had the requisite qualifications. The public will, then, was in this instance clearly and unequivocally expressed, by a Constitutional and numerous majority, that both candidates were worthy of the office; but here the expression of the public will ceased, and which of these two should be President was now to be decided by another Constitutional organ, that is, by the House of Representatives, voting by States.

The framers of the Constitution so intended, and the people who adopted it have so ordained, that their will in this case should be expressed by a majority of the States, acting by their representation in the House of Representatives. The right of selection is a right complete in itself, to be exercised by these second Electors, uninfluenced by any extraneous consideration, and governed only by their own sense of propriety and rectitude. The opinion of the people had been expressed by the Electors, but it only reached a certain point, and then was totally silent as to which of the two should be President, and their sense upon this point could only be collected through their Constitutional organ, the House of Representatives, voting by States. Any interference of the first Electors, or of an individual or individuals, must be informal and improper. The advice of sensible and candid men, as in every other case, might be useful; but could have no binding force whatever. The first Electors had no right to choose a Vice President. To claim it was overstepping their duty, and arrogating to themselves a power not given to them by the Constitution.

If there is anything in this whole transaction which has the most distant appearance of a breach of duty, it was in the Electors, by attempting to designate, and by exercising the important office of an Elector under the influence of improper motives; that is, by officiously attempting to decide the question, which of the two persons was proper for Vice President, which they were constitutionally incompetent to decide. By this conduct they attempted to break down an important guard provided by the Constitution, and improperly to release themselves from its obligations, which made it their duty to select two men qualified to be President. But if there can be a shadow of reason in this claim of the Electors to designate under the present Constitutional regulations, of which, to doubt, seems to be so heinous, what necessity can there be for this amendment? The object of the amendment, or certainly its chief object, is to establish the designating principle; but why this, if it can already be effected by the simple mode of placing one name first on the ballot, which is so easy to be done that it can scarcely be avoided? And if done, by the doctrine of gentlemen, it is so far binding on the House of Representatives, that if they even doubt, they are damned?

The fact certainly was, that at the last election, the great States brought forward the two candidates. They were both of the same political sentiments. This they had a Constitutional right to do. But it now seems that their language to the small States was: "because you will not give up your Constitutional rights to us, and let us go on and designate, we will stir up a civil war, and lay the blame to you; and of this improper conduct of ours we will take the advantage, and obtain an alteration of the Constitution, which will hereafter gratify us in every respect." A gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had said, that he heard, though he could not prove it, that the Federal majority, at the time of the last election, contemplated making a law authorizing or appointing some person as President, in case no choice had been made by the House of Representatives. I was then, sir, a member of the Government, and knew nothing of such a project; it might have been so; but supposing it was, what then? Why, says the gentleman, the person thus appointed could not have kept his head on his shoulders twenty-four hours; and this would have made a civil war. If the majority now should contemplate a measure which the Constitution does not authorize—as it clearly did not authorize the measure suspected by the gentleman, though he cannot prove it—the best thing in the world for them to do would be to give up, without any attempt to effect it, as it seems the Federal majority did. But what argument all this can afford in favor of the amendment, or why it was mentioned in this debate, is beyond my comprehension. In the result of the last election, the great States and the ruling political party were certainly gratified, and there does not appear the least reasonable ground of complaint against the small States, in the use of their Constitutional rights on the occasion. All support, therefore, to the amendment, drawn from that transaction, must fail.

I have said that the article fixing the mode of electing a Chief Magistrate was, from its nature, attended with many difficulties. A more strict inquiry into the Constitutional mode, and a comparison of it in some other and more particular points with the proposed alteration, will be useful in forming an opinion of their relative merits.

As the Constitution stands each Elector is to write the names of two persons on a piece of paper called a ballot. Either of the two persons thus voted for may be President, and the Elector cannot know which. This affords the most powerful inducement to vote for two, both of whom are qualified for the very important office. For it is not only uncertain upon whom the choice will fall at first, but the one remaining will certainly be President upon any contingency which shall remove or incapacitate the first. The Convention seem to have selected a mode of proceeding the most simple, the least liable to accident, and the best calculated to insure the main object, that is, that both should be really worthy of the trust. If one candidate wishes to make interest with the Electors, as each must vote for two, it will be impossible for bribery or intrigue to succeed; for, without corrupting the whole, or certainly many more than half, he may be defeated by the other candidate on the ballot. This is, perhaps, the most effectual bar to intrigue that was ever contrived; for, unless all, or a great proportion of the Electors are corrupted, an extreme case of depravity not probable in any country, intrigue can have no assurance of success. The danger and difficulty which must always attend such an important election as that of Chief Magistrate of the United States, was meant to be avoided by diminishing the chances of its frequent recurrence. So, two persons are placed in condition to act as President in succession, to prevent both the evils of vacancy and a recurrence of choice more frequently than once in four years: and it seems merely incidental to this second person to be called Vice President, and neither the first nor second description of Electors can have any right to vote for him as such. Indeed, he can have no existence till the first character is designated, and then seems to be discovered, not elected. The Senate, in case of an equal number of votes for two or more remaining persons, after the President is elected, are vested with authority to choose a Vice President, for as such he is to preside over this body, and this body therefore seems to be the only Constitutional organ to designate him. Both the other descriptions of Electors have nothing to do with such a character or office, but are confined to act with a single reference to the character and office of President, and are trusted with no power to give any opinion of the character or qualifications of a Vice President; and it is remarkable that there are no appropriate qualifications made necessary by the Constitution for a Vice President; but every qualification has reference to President. There is another important feature in this part of the Constitution. It was known by the Convention that in this country, in common with all others where there is freedom of opinion and of speech, there would be parties. They likewise knew, that the intolerance of the major or ruling sect and political party, was frequently exercised upon the minor party, and that the rights of the minority ought to be protected to them.

As well then to secure the rights of the minority, as to check the intolerance of the majority, they placed the majority in jeopardy, if they should attempt at grasping all the benefits of a President and Vice President within themselves, to the total exclusion of the minority. This very case which happened at the last session was contemplated, in which the majority attempted totally to exclude the minority from any participation. The language of the Constitution to such majorities is, "take care that you aim not at too much, for if you do, it is put into the power of the minority to check you, and, by a judicious disposition of their few votes, determine the choice of President." To avoid this event the majority will probably be cautious in the exercise of power; and thus the rights, the proper weight and influence of a minority, are secured against the conduct of the majority, which is certainly liable to be intolerant and oppressive. In this respect the spirit of the Constitution is, political moderation. And it is clear to my mind, that the experience of the last election has taught a lesson to all majorities, which will in future completely secure them from again incurring a similar risk. I recollect well that it was thought probable, when the electoral votes were given, that Mr. Burr would have a vote or two in some of the Eastern States. If he had received but one, he would have been by an electoral choice the Constitutional President. If the majority in future have powers of recollection, they will undoubtedly avoid the evil, if it is one, which happened at the last election, with such unfailling certainty, that there will be no need of the remedy proposed by the amendment. But the majority say, if their votes are so scattered for one candidate as to avoid this danger, that another will be incurred; and that is, the minority will elect a Vice President. The language of the Constitution to them is, again, "that this was meant as a security for the minority against the majority." But the majority exclaim against both these provisions as very unreasonable indeed. "What!" say they, "are minorities to govern majorities?" The answer of the Constitution is, "no, but their due weight and influence shall be secured to them, and the danger of your intolerance guarded against." For the security of small States and minorities, there is in the Constitution a mixture of the federative with the popular principles. And as it is well known that when popular majorities alone prevail, and exercise power uncontrolled by Constitutional checks, the minorities, who generally possess their proportion of integrity and virtue, are overwhelmed, and liberty itself, by the same means, destroyed; so it is in kindness to both parties, to the country and to humanity, that these wholesome checks are Constitutionally provided. Had the majority or the great States been willing fairly to have submitted to the Constitutional checks in the last election, no evil could have happened. And it is remarkable that the Constitution completely protects them, as long as they obey its precepts, in the creation of which they had an agency, and to which they have solemnly agreed. To prove that I am correct in these ideas, I not only refer to the Constitution but to the Secretary of State, (Mr. Madison.) In the Virginia Debates, volume 1, page 96, he says:

"But on a candid examination of history, we shall find that turbulence, violence, and abuse of power, by the majority trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions which, in Republics, have more frequently than any other cause produced despotism. If we go over the whole history of ancient and modern Republics, we shall find their destructions to have generally resulted from those causes. If we consider the peculiar situation of the United States, and what are the resources of that diversity of sentiments which pervades its inhabitants, we shall find great danger that the same causes may terminate here in the same fatal effects which they produced in those Republics. This danger ought to be wisely guarded against. Perhaps, in the progress of this discussion, it will appear that the only possible remedy for those evils, and means of preserving and protecting the principles of republicanism, will be found in that very system which is now exclaimed against as the parent of oppression."

Mr. President, it has been often said by the discerning and judicious of this and other countries, that our Constitution, for its brevity, its comprehensiveness, its perspicuity, and the political skill contained in it, was the best State paper extant. I believe all this and even more is a tribute justly due to its merits; and I am persuaded that the article which fixes a mode for the choice of a Chief Magistrate stands most prominent among its excellencies.

Let us now, sir, examine and compare the merits of the amendment with a special reference to this last view we have taken of the Constitutional provision.

The amendment authorizes the Electors to vote for a President and Vice President by a specific designation. Is ambition in your country? Here is a direct and inviting object for its operation.—Is the integrity of your Electors assailable? You place it here in the most encouraging attitude for an assault. A fear of detection, and a sense of shame, upon the exposure of an improper action, has been, perhaps, a better security against political errors or crimes, than all the moral virtues united, when the temptation has been attended with an impossibility of detection. An intrigue with an Elector can be carried on without much danger of detection; but when your election is carried into the House of Representatives, besides the ordinary weight of character in favor of the members of that House, a detection of an intrigue with a candidate is almost certain. It will be recollected that at the last election two or three members held the choice perfectly in their own hands. If I mistake not, three gentlemen, that is, a member from New Jersey, a member from Vermont, and one from either Maryland, Delaware, or Tennessee, could have given a President to the United States. The particular gentlemen mentioned were above suspicion of bribery; but, in addition to this circumstance, if they had in the contest gone over from improper motives, or under the influence of bribery, a detection was certain.

This will remain forever the criterion, as it respects the relative danger of intrigue and bribery, in the two modes of choice. And the amendment is avowedly intended to secure a choice by Electors, and to prevent a resort to the House; because, says the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAYLOR,) "if you permit the election to go into the House, there are small States, and minorities, and all the evils of a diet election;" meaning that corruption must be the consequence. But, he says, "let there be a divided election by the Electors, meeting by States separately, and you lessen the tendency to corruption." This may look plausible in theory, but I think practice will show its fallacy.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

It may be better for the Electors to meet by States than for all to be together, but this can never prove that they are less liable to corruption than the House of Representatives; which is the only point in question.

The manner of electing the Vice President, as proposed by the amendment, not only invites ambition to an unchecked operation, but exposes us to the selection of a less important and more unfit person than the Constitutional provision. In addition to his importance in the Government, arising from his incidental succession to the Chief Magistracy, the Vice President is ex officio President of the Senate, and gives a direct influence to the State from which he is chosen, of a third vote in this body, in all cases of equal division, which are usually the cases of most importance. Besides, his influence as presiding officer is, perhaps, more than equal to the right of a vote. It becomes therefore peculiarly important to the small States, and to minorities, whose security rests in this body, not only that their influence in the election of Vice President should not be diminished, but that no measure be adopted which may tend to bestow the office upon an unworthy character. By the proposed amendment, this character must necessarily become a sort of make-weight and stepping-stone for the Presidency. As in recruiting for an army, a man, active, and of a particular cast of character, but not very proper for a Commander-in-Chief, is employed to obtain recruits, and, upon condition that he obtains a given number, is to be rewarded with a sergeant's warrant; so, in this case, the man who can procure a given number of votes for President will be encouraged to hope for the Vice Presidency; and where will such characters be sought after? In Delaware or Rhode Island? No, sir, but in the great States; there the recruiting talents will be put in operation, because the number of recruits, or votes, will be sufficient to test his active and recruiting merits. And thus the office of Vice President will be sent to market with hardly a possible chance to meet an honest purchaser.

I have already remarked upon the alteration made by the Senate in the resolution passed by the House of Representatives, changing the number five to three. But, one addition, made this morning, deserves attention. I mean that which authorizes the Vice President to administer the Government in case neither the first nor the second Constitutional Electors effect a choice of President. This is a new principle, and its operation is more uncertain than that of any other part of the proposed amendment. Viewing it in one point of light, it may be thought to confer a new power upon the Senate, that of giving a President to the Union. And, it is said, that this part will recompense the small States, who have the ascendancy in the Senate, for the injury inflicted by the other parts of the amendment. If it be true that the last part restores all which the former parts have taken away from us, it is inconceivable why any man can wish to pass a resolution the parts of which thus mutually destroy each other. It is possible that, by the force of intrigue and faction, the Electors may be induced to scatter their votes for both President and Vice President, in such manner as to present several candidates to the House for President, and two or more to the Senate for Vice President; in which case the Senate might immediately choose or select a Vice President. In this state of things, there is an opportunity afforded for intrigue of a very extensive and alarming nature. The Senate, I mean a majority of them, might wish that the man whom they had elected Vice President should administer the Government, and if the House could be prevented from agreeing, their wishes would be gratified. The facility of preventing over that of producing a choice is very obvious.

A bold address may be made to any member of the House, without wounding his pride or offending his morality, to adhere to his candidate, and not change his vote so as to effect a choice. He can be told that there is no danger of leaving the United States without a President, as there is one already chosen to his hand by the Senate; and this person may be more the object of his wishes than any of the other candidates, his favorite excepted. In this process the Senate may give a President to the United States. But if the probability of such a process and such an event is increased by the amendment of this morning, it cannot certainly greatly recommend it. For myself I wish for no alteration in the Constitution, not even if its operations were directly in favor of the small States, more especially if such a favor is to be derived through a sort of double conspiracy of intrigue; in the first place, to operate on the Electors, and then on the House of Representatives. It seems to me, that the small States had better be contented to enjoy the rights now secured to them by the Constitution, which they can honestly do, rather than submit to a deprivation of their rights for the sake of dishonestly obtaining a restoration of them. We may charitably and safely conclude that the majority do not intend, by this part of the amendment, to expose the country to such a scene of iniquity. And the uncertainty of its operations alone, is, in my mind, a sufficient ground for rejection. However the operation of this part of the amendment may appear in theory, as to other points, it seems to me that, in one point, all must agree: and that is, when the House of Representatives know that the United States will be left without an Executive Magistrate, in case they do not agree. This awful responsibility will speak in a voice too loud for the hardihood of party entirely to disregard. And may I not suggest, without giving offence, that the operation of this very responsibility has been proved, at least in some degree, in the proceedings of the last Presidential election?

If this last-mentioned security be worth preserving, it follows, of course, that the part of the amendment alluded to ought not to pass.

There is another view of the Constitution which has a reference to the general subject before us; and that is, the caution exhibited with respect to the introduction of amendments. In an instrument so important, and containing many features new, if not to the world, at least to ourselves, although we might approve of its principles, yet experience might discover errors as to the mode devised for carrying those principles into effect. Hence it was the part of wisdom and caution to provide for such alterations in practice as would give the fairest operation to principles, without incurring the confusion and agitation incidental to a general Convention. But, lest the daring and restive spirit of innovation should injure or destroy, under the specious name of amendment, that same wisdom and caution hath provided salutary checks.

"Two-thirds of both Houses of the Congress shall deem it necessary" to propose amendments; and three-fourths of the State Legislatures shall ratify such amendments, before they acquire validity. I speak now, sir, of the mode which has always been, and probably will be, put in practice to obtain amendments. The other Constitutional mode is equally guarded as to numbers, but, as it has no relation to the subject now in debate, may be laid aside. "Two-thirds of both Houses," must, I think, on every fair principle of construction, mean two-thirds of all the members. The number of Senators is thirty-four, two-thirds being twenty-three. And as there is no representation from New Jersey, the number of Representatives is one hundred thirty-six, two-thirds being ninety-one.

My impressions are, sir, that this amendment cannot constitutionally be proposed to the State Legislatures unless it is agreed to in the two Houses by those numbers twenty-three and ninety-one, respectively. This is a Constitutional point, which, I am told, has never been agitated, but is certainly worthy of attention. If the construction should prevail that two-thirds of the members present, at any time, might propose amendments, the consequence is that twelve Senators, being two-thirds of a quorum, and forty-eight Representatives, being a similar two-thirds, might propose any and the most important amendments. I am aware sir, that it may be said such propositions are not final, they may yet be ratified or rejected by the State Legislatures. But the spirit of the Constitution seems to require two-thirds of the nation, acting by its proper organs, to propose amendments; and that, in so interesting a subject as a Constitutional alteration a less number should have no authority.

The letter of the Constitution will certainly justify this idea of its spirit. When two-thirds of the Senate are requisite to consent and advise to a treaty, the words are "two-thirds of the Senators present." To convict on impeachment "two-thirds of the members present." Yeas and nays are to be entered on the Journal "at the desire of one-fifth of those present." In the two first cases it is requisite to act immediately, whether two-thirds of the whole are present or not; then we see, the expressions are clear, "two-thirds" refers to the numbers present. Why so? Because, without these expressions, the reference would have been understood to the whole number of members. In the last case, why add the word "present" to the one-fifth? Because, without that word, "one-fifth" of the whole would have been its meaning. In all other cases, when two-thirds are required, the spirit of the Constitution certainly is, and the words seem to carry the meaning, "two-thirds" of the whole numbers. It is said, "that a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business," "House," in this case, must mean all the members. Two-thirds of both Houses must, on the same principles, mean two-thirds of all the members of both. There is, I acknowledge, some obscurity, in the Constitutional use of the word "House," when either of the two branches of Congress is described by it; but if the intention and sense, as well as words, are attended to, I am forcibly led to believe that two-thirds of all the members of both Houses are required to sanction propositions for amendments, and that this construction is most consistent with the wisdom and political skill of the Convention. The construction for which I contend is analogous to the caution manifest in other parts of the Constitution. It was well known to the Convention that amendments, if recommended or proposed by Congress, would have an imposing influence with the State Legislatures; and that, in no possible instance, could more evil arise from indigested measures than in the case of amendments, owing to the impossibility of clearly foreseeing their operation and effects on the general Constitutional system. It was made requisite, therefore, to wait for the uninfluenced movement of two-thirds of the popular and Federative Representatives of the nation. Whatever may be our opinion on the point now discussed, the State Legislatures have a Constitutional right to judge of it for themselves and to determine whether a proposition for an amendment is presented to them, with the sanction required, and, if, in their opinions, the requisite numbers have not agreed to the proposition, they will guard the Constitution, by refusing to ratify such amendment. My honorable friend from New Hampshire (Mr. PLUMER) has done such ample justice to this part of the subject as to place it out of the reach of my assistance, and beyond the need of any.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that the amendment now under consideration could not, in the Senate, obtain a Constitutional majority of two-thirds, or even a simple majority, were it not for the influence of instructions. Some gentlemen have ingeniously said that, until they gave this amendment the present particular examination, they had not contemplated the extent of its probable effects, and, although they entertained doubts, yet they were induced, by the instructions given them, to make the proposition to the Legislatures and let them decide for themselves.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Whatever may or can be said in favor of instructions generally, cannot be applicable to this case. For the purpose of obtaining amendments to the Constitution, Congress can only propose and the State Legislatures ratify. The duties are appropriate and distinct, and the uninfluenced independent act of both requisite. The Legislatures cannot ratify till a proposal is made. This subject can be elucidated and enforced by familiar examples. The House of Representatives alone can originate a bill for raising revenue, but it cannot become a law without the concurrence of the Senate. Would not the advice and instruction of the Senate to the House, intimating our desire that they would originate and send to us for concurrence, a revenue bill, be thought improper, indelicate, and even unconstitutional? The President and Senate can appoint certain officers, but they have distinct and appropriate agencies in the appointment. The President can nominate, but cannot appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate.

But the Senate cannot nominate, nor could their advice to the President to make a nomination, be either binding or proper. The character of the several independent branches of our Government, forming Constitutional checks upon each other, cannot be exemplified more fully than in the mode of producing amendments. And an interference of one independent body, upon the appropriate and distinct duties of another, can in no instance have a more prejudicial effect. Can it be thought, then, either proper or Constitutional for the State Legislatures to assume the power of instructing to propose to them a measure when the power of proposing is not only not given to them but given exclusively to Congress? As well and with as much propriety might Congress make a law attempting to bind the State Legislatures to ratify, as the Legislatures, by instructions, bind Congress to propose. In either case, the check which, for obviously wise purposes, was introduced into the Constitution, is totally destroyed. And we have not as much security against improper amendments, as we should have if the power were exclusively vested in the State Legislatures, and for this obvious reason, that, in this mode of operation, the responsibility for the adoption of an improper amendment is divided and destroyed. Is the sentiment correct, sir, that we shall be justifiable in sending forth this proposition to be considered by the State Legislatures, if we believe it ought not to be ratified? What would be thought of the Senate if they should pass a bill and send it to the House of Representatives for concurrence, the provisions of which they disliked entirely, and wished not to be established? And can any sound distinction be made between such a measure and the one now before us? In either case, the single act of the other body would be final, and in either case the people at large would be safer to have but one body in existence to legislate or make amendments; for all our agency, in both cases, would only tend to deceive and mislead, and, in addition, to diminish if not destroy, as has just been observed, the responsibility of the other body. It has been said, sir, that the House of Representatives have twice given a sanction to this measure, and that their conduct, in this particular, adds weight to it. I wish to treat that honorable body with the highest respect, but I must deviate from the truth were I to acknowledge that their conduct upon this amendment has a tendency to convince me that they have a full understanding of the subject. Twice have they sent us a resolution, similar in its leading feature to that on your table, and made no provision that the person to be Vice President should be qualified for the highly responsible office, either in age, or citizenship; and, for aught that they had guarded against, we might have had a man in the Chief Magistracy from Morocco, a foreigner, who had not been in the country a month.

Mr. President,—it was suggested in a former part of the debate, by a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. BUTLER,) that the great States, or ruling party of the day, had brought forward this amendment, for the purpose of preventing the choice of a Federal Vice President at the next election. And we are now put beyond the power of doubt, that this is, at least, one motive, by the observations of several of the majority, but especially by those of the gentleman from Virginia. He informs us, and I appreciate his frankness, that if the friends of this measure do not seize the present opportunity to pass it, the opportunity will never recur. He tells us plainly, that a minor faction ought to be discouraged, that all hopes or prospect of rising into consequence, much more of rising into office, should be crushed, and that this amendment is to produce a part of these beneficial effects; which amendment he compares to the bill which was introduced into the British Parliament, to exclude a popish successor to the Crown, commonly called the exclusion bill. Have the minority then, no right left, but the right to be trampled upon by the majority? This is identically the conduct which is mentioned in the quotation which I have had the honor to make from the Secretary of State; to which I ask leave to recur: "The majority, by trampling on the 'rights of the minority, have produced factions 'and commotions, which, in Republics, have more 'frequently than any other cause produced despotism."

What avails it then, that this country has triumphed over the invasion and violence of one oppressor, if they must now be victims to the violence of thousands? Political death is denounced now; what denunciation will follow? It would be a useless affectation in us to pretend to close our eyes upon either the cause or consequences of this measure.

The spirit of party has risen so high, at the present day, that it dares to attempt what in milder times would be beyond the reach of calculation. To this overwhelming torrent every consideration must give way.

The gentleman is perfectly correct, in supposing that now is the only time to pass this resolution; there is a tide in the affairs of party most emphatically, and unless its height is taken, its acme improved, the shallows soon appear, and the present demon of party give place to a successor. A hope is undoubtedly now indulged that one great and dominant passion will, like Aaron's rod, swallow up every other, and that the favorable moment can now be seized to crush the small States, and to obtain their own agency in the transaction. And when we recur to the history of former confederacies, and find the small States arrayed in conflict against each other, to fight, to suffer, and to die, for the transient gratification of the great States, have we not some reason to fear the success of this measure?

In the Senate, is the security of the small States; their feeble voice in the House of Representatives is lost in the potent magic of numbers and wealth. Never until now has the force of the small States, which was provided by the Constitution, and lodged in this federative body, as a weapon of self-defence, been able to bear upon this question. And will the small States, instead of defending their own interest, their existence, sacrifice them to a gust of momentary passion? to the short-lived gratification of party prejudice?

This resolution, if circumstances shall equivocally demand it, can pass at the next, or any future session of Congress. But once passed, and its passage will operate like the grave; the sacrificed rights of the small States will be gone for ever. Is it possible, sir, that any small State can submit to be a satellite in the State system, and revolve in a secondary orbit around a great State? Act in humble devotion to her will, till her purposes are gratified, and then content herself to be thrown aside like a cast garment, an object of her own unceasing regret, and fit only for the hand of scorn to point its slow unmoving finger at? Can the members of the Senate who represent the small States quietly cross their hands and request the great States to bind them fast, and to draw the ligature?

I am aware, sir, that I shall be accused of an attempt to excite the jealousy of the small States. Mr. President, I represent a small State, I feel the danger, and claim the Constitutional right to sound the alarm. From the same altar on which the small States shall be immolated, will rise the smoke of sacrificed liberty; and despotism must be the dreadful successor.

It is the cause of my country and of humanity which I plead. And when one vast, overwhelming passion is in exercise, full well I know, sir, that no warning voice, no excitement but jealousy, has been found sufficiently active and energetic to dissolve the wizard spell, and force mankind to listen to argument. Jealousy, hateful in private life, has perhaps done more in the preservation of political rights than all the virtues united.

I have made the stand, sir, in the Senate, which I thought the importance of the subject demanded. If I fail here, there is hope of success with the State Legislatures. If nothing can withstand the torrent there, I shall experience the satisfaction which is derived from a consciousness of having raised my feeble voice in defence of that Constitution, which is not only the security of the small States, but the palladium of my country's rights, and shall console myself with the reflection that I have done my duty.

MR. TAYLOR.—The opposition to this discriminating amendment to the Constitution is condensed into a single stratagem, namely: an effort to excite the passion of jealousy in various forms. Endeavors have been made to excite geographical jealousies—a jealousy of the smaller against the larger States—a jealousy in the people against the idea of amending the Constitution; and even a jealousy against individual members of this House. Sir, is this passion a good medium through which to discern truth, or is it a mirror calculated to reflect error? Will it enlighten or deceive? Is it planted in good or in evil—in moral or in vicious principles? Wherefore, then, do gentlemen endeavor to blow it up? Is it because they distrust the strength of their arguments, that they resort to this furious and erring passion? Is it because they know that ——“Trifles light as air,

Are, to the jealous, confirmation strong
As proofs of holy writ?”

So far as these efforts have been directed towards a geographical demarcation of the interests of the Union into North and South, in order to excite a jealousy of one division against another; and, so far as they have been used to create suspicions of individuals, they have been either so feeble, inapplicable, or frivolous, as to bear but lightly upon the question, and to merit but little attention. But the attempts to array States against States because they differ in size, and to prejudice the people against the idea of amending their Constitution, bear a more formidable aspect, and ought to be repelled, because they are founded on principles the most mischievous and inimical to the Constitution, and could they be successful, are replete with great mischiefs.

Towards exciting this jealousy of smaller States against larger States, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TRACY) had labored to prove that the federal principle of the Constitution of the United States was founded in the idea of minority invested with operative power. That, in pursuance of this principle, it was contemplated and intended that the election of a President should frequently come into the House of Representatives, and to divert it from thence by this amendment would trench upon the federal principle of our Constitution, and diminish the rights of the smaller States, bestowed by this principle upon them. This was the scope of his argument to excite their jealousy, and is the amount also of several other arguments delivered by gentlemen on the same side of the question. He did not question the words, but the ideas of gentlemen. Words, selected from their comrades, are easily asserted to misrepresent opinions, as he had himself experienced during the discussion on the subject.

This idea of federalism* ought to be well discussed by the smaller States, before they will suffer it to produce the intended effect—that of exciting their jealousy against the larger. To him it appeared to be evidently incorrect. Two principles sustain our Constitution: one a majority of the people, the other a majority of the States; the first was necessary to preserve the liberty or sovereignty of the people; the last, to preserve the liberty or sovereignty of the States. But both are founded in the principle of majority; and the effort of the Constitution is to preserve this principle in relation both to the people and the States, so that neither species of sovereignty or independence should be able to destroy the other. Many illustrations might be adduced. That of amending the Constitution will suffice. Three-fourths of the States must concur in this object, because a less number or a majority of States might not contain a majority of people; therefore, the Constitution is not amendable by a majority of States, lest a species of State sovereignty might, under color of amending the Constitution, infringe the right of the people. On the other hand, a majority of the people residing in the large States cannot amend the Constitution, lest they should diminish or destroy the sovereignty of the small States, the federal Union, or federalism itself. Hence a concurrence of the States to amend the Constitution became necessary, not because federalism was founded in the idea of minority, but for a reason the very reverse of that idea—that is, to cover the will both of a majority of the people and a majority of States, so as to preserve the great element of self-government, as it regarded State sovereignty, and also as it regarded the sovereignty of the people.

For this great purpose certain political functions are assigned to be performed, under the auspices of the State or federal principle, and certain others under the popular principle. It was the intention of the Constitution that these functions should be performed in conformity to its principle. If that principle is in fact a government of a minority, then these functions ought to be performed by a minority. When the federal principle is performing a function, according to this idea, a majority of the States ought to decide. And, by the same mode of reasoning, when the popular principle is performing a function, then a minority of the people ought to decide. This brings us precisely to the question of the amendment. It is the intention of the Constitution that the popular principle shall operate in the election of a President and Vice President. It is also the intention of the Constitution that the popular principle, in discharging the functions committed to it by the Constitution, should operate by a majority and not by a minority. That the majority of the people should be driven, by an unforeseen state of parties, to the necessity of relinquishing their will in the election of one or the other of these officers, or that the principle of majority, in a function confided to the popular will, should be deprived of half its rights, and be laid under a necessity of violating its duty to preserve the other half, is not the intention of the Constitution.

But the gentleman from Connecticut has leaped over all this ground, and gotten into the House of Representatives, without considering the principles of the Constitution, as applicable to the election of President and Vice President by Electors, and distinguishing them from an election by the House of Representatives. And by mingling and interweaving the two modes of electing together, a considerable degree of complexity has been produced. If, however, it is admitted that in an election of a President and Vice President by Electors, that the will of the electing majority ought fairly to operate, and that an election by the will of a minority would be an abuse or corruption of the principles of the Constitution, then it follows that an amendment, to avoid this abuse, accords with, and is necessary to save these principles. In like manner, had an abuse crept into the same election, whenever it was to be made under the federal principle by the House of Representatives, enabling a minority of States to carry the election, it would not have violated the intention of the Constitution to have corrected this abuse, also, by an amendment. For, sir, I must suppose it to have been the intention of the Constitution that both the federal principle and the popular principle should operate in those functions respectively assigned to them, perfectly and not imperfectly—that is, the former by a majority of States, and the latter by a majority of the people.

Under this view of the subject, the amendment ought to be considered. Then the question will be, whether it is calculated or not to cause the popular principle, applied by the Constitution in the first instance, to operate perfectly, and to prevent the abuse of an election by a minority? If it is, it corresponds with the intention, diminishes nothing of the rights of the smaller States, and, of course, affords them no cause of jealousy.

Sir, it could never have been the intention of the Constitution to produce a state of things by which a majority of the popular principle should be under the necessity of voting against its judgment to secure a President, and by which a minor faction should acquire a power capable of defeating the majority in the election of President, or of electing a Vice President contrary to the will of the electing principle. To permit this abuse would be a fraudulent mode of defeating the operation of the popular principle in this election, in order to transfer it to the federal principle—to disinherit the people for the sake of endowing the House of Representatives; whereas it was an accidental and not an artificial disappointment in the election of a President, against which the Constitution intended to provide. A fair and not an unfair attempt to elect was previously to be made by the popular principle, before the election was to go into the House of Representatives. And if the people of all the States, both large and small, should, by an abuse of the real design of the Constitution, be bubbled out of the election of Executive power, by leaving to them the nominal right of an abortive effort, and transferring to the House of Representatives the substantial right of a real election, nothing will remain but to corrupt the election in that House by some of those abuses of which elections by diets are susceptible, to bestow upon Executive power an aspect both formidable and inconsistent with the principles by which the Constitution intended to mould it.

The great check imposed upon Executive power was a popular mode of election; and the true object of jealousy, which ought to attract the attention of the people of every State, is any circumstance tending to diminish or destroy that check. It was also a primary intention of the Constitution to keep Executive power independent of Legislative; and although a provision was made for its election by the House of Representatives in a possible case, that possible case never was intended to be converted into the active rule, so as to destroy in a degree the line of separation and independency between the Executive and Legislative power. The controversy is not therefore between larger and smaller States, but between the people of every State and the House of Representatives. Is it better that the people—a fair majority of the popular principle—should elect Executive power; or, that a minor faction should be enabled to embarrass and defeat the judgment and will of this majority, and throw the election into the House of Representatives? This is the question. If this amendment should enable the popular principle to elect Executive power, and thus keep it separate and distinct from legislation, the intention of the Constitution, the interest of the people, and the principles of our policy, will be preserved; and if so, it is as I have often endeavored to prove in this debate, the interest of the smaller States themselves, that the amendment should prevail. For, sir, is an exposure of their Representatives to bribery and corruption (a thing which may possibly happen at some future day, when men lose that public virtue which now governs them) an acquisition more desirable than all those great objects best (if not exclusively) attainable by the election of Executive power by the popular principle of the Federal Government, as the Constitution itself meditates and prefers?

So far, then, the amendment strictly coincides with the Constitution and with the interests of the people of every State in the Union. But suppose by some rare accident the election should still be sent into the House of Representatives, does not the amendment then afford cause of jealousy to the smaller States? Sir, each State has but one vote, whether it is large or small; and the President and Vice President are still to be chosen out of five persons. Such is the Constitution in both respects now. To have enlarged the number of nominees, would have increased the occurrence of an election by the House of Representatives; and if, as I have endeavored to prove, it is for the interest of every State, that the election should be made by the popular principle of Government and not by that House, then it follows, that whatever would have a tendency to draw the election into that House, is against the interest of every State in the Union; and that every State in the Union is interested to avoid an enlargement of the nominees, if it would have such a tendency.

Sir, the endeavor to excite a national jealousy against the idea of amending the Constitution, is in my view infinitely more dangerous and alarming than even the attempt to marshal States against States. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TRACY) has twice pronounced with great emphasis, "man is man," and attempted to make inferences against all attempts to amend our Constitution from the evil moral qualities with which human nature is afflicted! Sir, he has forgotten that Governments as well as nations are constituted of men, and that if the vices of governed man ought to alarm us for the safety of liberty, the vices of governing man are not calculated to assuage our apprehensions. Sir, it is this latter species of depravity which has suggested to the people of America a new idea, enforced by constitutions. Permit me to illustrate this new idea by the terms political law and municipal law. The former is that law, called Constitutional, contrived and enacted in the United States, to control those evil moral qualities to which this creature "man" is liable when invested with power. The latter is that law enacted to control the vices of man in his private capacity. If the former species of law should be suffered to remain unchanged, the effects would be the same as if the latter should remain unchanged. Both, unaltered, would be evaded by the ingenuity, avarice, and ambition of public man, as well as private man. And, therefore, it is as necessary for the preservation of liberty, that constitutions or political law should be amended from time to time, in order to preserve liberty against the avarice and ambition of men in power, by meeting and controlling their artifices, as it is occasionally to amend municipal law, for the preservation of property against the vicious practices of men not in power.

To illustrate this argument, I will repeat a position which I lately advanced, namely, that the substance of a Constitution may be effectually destroyed, and yet its form may remain unaltered. England illustrates it. The Government of that country took its present form in the thirteenth century; but its aspect in substance has been extremely different at different periods, under the same form. Without taking time to mark the changes in substance which have taken place under the form of Kings, Lords, and Commons, it will suffice to cast our eyes upon the present state of that Government. What are now its chief and substantial energies? Armies, debt, Executive patronage, penal laws, and corporations. These are the modern energies or substance of the English monarchy; to the ancient English monarchy they were unknown. Of the ancient, they were substantial abuses; for, whether these modern energies are good or bad, they overturned the ancient monarchy substantially, without altering its form. Under every change of Administration these abuses proceeded. The outs were clamorous for preserving the constitution, as they called it; for, though divorced from its administration, the hope of getting in again caused them to maintain abuses, by which their avarice or ambition might be gratified upon the next turn of the wheel; just as in Prussia, where divorces are common, nothing is more usual than for late husbands to affect a violent passion for a former wife, if she carried off from him a good estate! And the ins fearing the national jealousy, and the prepossession against amending the form of Government, and meeting new abuses by new remedies, brought no relief to the nation. So that under every change of men abuses proceeded.

Amendment to the Constitution.

The solution of this effect exists in the species of political craft similar to priestcraft. Mankind were anciently deprived of their religious liberty by a dissemination of a fanatical zeal for some idol; in times of ignorance, this idol was of physical structure; and when that fraud was detected, a metaphysical idol in the shape of a tenet or dogma was substituted for it, infinitely more pernicious in its effects, because infinitely more difficult of detection. The same system has been pursued by political craft. It has ever labored to excite the same species of idolatry and superstition for the same reason, namely, to conceal its own frauds and vices. Sometimes it sets up a physical, at others a metaphysical idol, as the object of vulgar superstition. Of one, the former "Grand Monarch of France;" of the other, the present "Church and State" tenet of England is an evidence. And if our Constitution is to be made like the "Church and State" tenet of England, a metaphysical political idol, which it will be sacrilege to amend, even for the sake of saving both that and the national liberty; and if, like that tenet, it is to be exposed to all the means which centuries may suggest to vicious men for its substantial destruction, it is not hard to imagine that it also may become a monument of the inefficacy of unalterable forms of political law to correct avarice and ambition in the new and multifarious shapes they are forever assuming.

A Constitution may allegorically be considered as a temple for the preservation of the treasure of liberty. Around it may be posted one, two, or three, or more sentinels; but unless these sentinels are themselves watched by the people, and unless the injuries they are frequently committing upon the temple are diligently repaired, such is the nature of man in power, that the very sentinels themselves have invariably broken into the temple and conveyed away the treasure. And this because of the delusion inspired by political idolatry, which forbids nations to meet abuses by amending their Governments or constitutions; and teaches them that municipal law alone will suffice for their happiness.

Permit me, sir, to illustrate this argument by declaring how I would proceed, if such was my design to destroy the Constitution of the United States, premising that I speak prospectively and not retrospectively. I would have recourse to those very energies which constitute the English monarchy: armies, debt, Executive patronage, penal laws, and corporations. I would endeavor, by these monarchical energies, to produce the same effects as in England; and I would hide my intentions by exciting a fanatical adoration for the Constitution, which I would endeavor to make a metaphysical idol; and which I would myself adore, in order to destroy. Whilst I pretended to be its devotee, it should become my screen.

This, sir, will be the consequence, if the people of the United States should become jealous of the amending the Constitution; and therefore this species of jealousy so industriously attempted to be excited, is calculated, if it could operate, to bring upon them the utmost calamity. Abuses of a political system will happen; and amendments only can meet abuses. Public opinion, and not an idolatrous tenet, is the element of our policy; and, however the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) may deride the opinion of the people, it is the element in which our policy is rooted, and which can at all times be safely entrusted with moulding their form of Government.

Sir, I quote gentlemen's ideas and not their words. Is it not true that the gentleman ridiculed a recommendation of this very amendment, even from a State Legislature, because of some grammatical inaccuracy; and that he reasoned against the possibility of knowing what the public opinion was; and yet, however inaccurately it may be expressed, that gentleman certainly has had sufficient evidence to convince him that public opinion is really a noun substantive.

It has been urged, sir, by the gentlemen in opposition, in a mode, as if they supposed we wished to conceal or deny it, that one object of this amendment is to bestow upon the majority a power to elect a Vice President. Sir, I avow it to be so. This is one object of the amendment; and the other, as to which I have heretofore expressed my sentiments, is to enable the Electors, by perfecting the election of a President, to keep it out of the House of Representatives. Are not both objects correct, if, as I have endeavored to prove, the Constitution, in all cases where it refers elections to the popular principle, intended that principle to act by majorities? Did the Constitution intend that any minor faction should elect a Vice President? If not, then an amendment to prevent it accords with, and is representative of, the Constitution. Permit me here again to illustrate by a historical case. England, in the time of Charles the Second, was divided into two parties—Protestants and Papists—and the heir to the throne was a Papist. The Protestants, constituting the majority of the nation, passed an exclusion bill, but it was defeated, and the minor Papist faction, in the person of the Duke of York, got possession of Executive power. The consequences were, domestic oppressions and rebellions, foreign wars occasionally for almost a century, and the foundation of a national debt, under which the nation has been ever since groaning, and under which the Government will finally expire.

Had the majority carried and executed the proposed exclusion of James II. from Executive power, the English would have escaped all these calamities. Such precisely may be our case. I beg again that it may be understood that, in this application, I speak prospectively and not retrospectively.

But it is far from being improbable, that in place of these religious parties, political parties may arise of equal zeal and animosity. We may at some future day see our country divided into a Republican party and a Monarchical party. Is it wise, or according to the intention of the Constitution, that a minor monarchical faction should, by any means, acquire the power of electing a Vice President; the possible successor to Executive power? Ought a Republican majority to stake the national liberty upon the frail life of one man? Will not a monarchical Executive overturn the system of a republican Executive? And ought the United States to shut their eyes upon this possible danger until the case shall happen, when it may be too late to open them?

Sir, let us contemplate the dreadful evils which the English nation have suffered from the cause of investing Executive power in a man hostile to the national opinion, and avoid them. They suffered, because their exclusion bill was abortive. Election is our exclusion bill. Its efficacy depends upon its being exercised by a majority. It is only a minority which can render election insufficient to exclude monarchical principles from Executive power. It is against minority that election is intended to operate, because minority is the author of monarchy and aristocracy.

Shall we, sir, be so injudicious as to make election destroy the principle of election by adhering to a mode of exercising it, now seen to be capable of bestowing upon a minority the choice of a Vice President? Shall we make election, invented to exclude monarchy, a handmaid for its introduction? Or shall we, if we do not see monarchy at this day assailing our republican system, conclude that it never will; although we know that this system has but two foes, of whom monarchy is one? No, sir, let us rather draw instruction from the prophetic observations of a member of the English House of Commons, whilst the bill for excluding James II. was depending, who said:

"I hear a lion in the lobby roar,
Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we shut the door,
And keep him there? Or shall we let him in,
To try if we can get him out again?"

Instead of shutting the door, the English left it open; tyranny got in; and the evils produced by its expulsion, to that nation, may possibly have been equal to those which submission would have produced.

Sir, much has been said about the rights of minorities, and the tendency of this amendment to keep up party spirit. I wish I could hear these rights of minorities defined. It is easy to comprehend the justice of the position, "that every individual in society has equal rights, whether he belongs to a majority or a minority;" but the idea of a minor faction, having political rights as a faction, to me is incomprehensible. On the contrary, I consider all minor factions as inflamed, excited, and invigorated by a prospect of success; just as the Popish faction, in the period quoted of the English history, was kept alive and propelled to make attempts, which they never would have made, had it not been for the excitement arising from the prospect of gaining possession of Executive power; so here, if at a future day a minor and monarchical party should arise, that also will be propelled and excited by the chance of getting possession of Executive power, to keep party spirit alive, and to make attempts which they never would have made, if no such excitement existed. Hence the amendment, if it will have the effect of depriving a minor faction of the possibility of getting possession of Executive power, will suppress and not provoke party and faction.

Mr. President, we have been warned by a picture of the evils produced by the French revolution, to forbear to amend our Constitution; for what end I am at a loss to conjecture. Sir, how are these arguments intended to apply to the people of the United States? If the state of national information in France has disqualified the great mass of that nation for the enjoyment of self-government, does it therefore follow that the people of America are disqualified for self-government? If this State adopts the French nation for the species of government now existing in France, does it follow that we are adapted for a similar government? Sir, it is our superior degree of national knowledge which enables us safely to use national opinion as an element of government. This is evinced by facts. In France, constitutions were several times made and amended without producing good effect; in America, constitutions have been, in many instances, perhaps to the extent of sixty or seventy, made, repeated and amended, without producing the least disturbance or evil effects in a single case. Changes in France, even often for the worse; here generally, and perhaps constantly, for the better. It is because the public will is here rooted in a sufficient degree of public knowledge to preserve a moderate and free government. Shall we sacrifice this will and a right to amend our constitutions, to a species of metaphysical idolatry, although we owe to these sources all the prosperity and happiness we now possess? For the doctrine, "that it is a species of political sacrilege to amend constitutions, and that the people should be jealous of every such attempt;" is precisely the best means to destroy the right in the people to do so. It is a doctrine levelled against the people themselves, under the predominance of whose will the right can only be exercised; and tending to throw this mode of national self-defence against the arts of avarice and ambition in the back ground; whilst these foes can carry on their encroachments upon liberty and property, by form of law. Let not, then, the people of the United States be deterred from exercising their right to alter their constitutions, so frequently and so successfully exercised, by a picture of the French Revolution.

Finally, Mr. President, this amendment receives my approbation and support, because I think it conformable to public opinion, evidently the special recommendation of sundry States, and the concurrence of a great majority of the representatives of the people in the other House; because it accords with the principle of self-government that this expression of the public will should be obeyed, that the right of the nation to amend the form of its Government, should, upon that ground, be solemnly recognised; because elections, the result of preference, are more consistent with moral rectitude, than those influenced or guided by intrigue, party artifice, or the intrigues of diets; and because it was the intention of the Constitution that the election of a President and Vice President should be determined, by a fair expression of the public will by a majority, and not that this intention should be defeated by the subsequent occurrence of a state of parties, neither foreseen nor contemplated by the Constitution or those who made it.

Mr. JACKSON.—The gentleman from Connecticut has alleged that the Georgia Electors had consulted him, and that there was an intrigue, and seemed to insinuate something about bribery. I expect that gentleman will explain himself.

Mr. TRACY said he had meant no improper imputation whatever on the gentleman's character. The gentleman had talked of his being at a meeting of gentlemen in Georgia, and that a letter had been received which changed the intentions of the Electors; and he had also talked of intrigues; and it certainly appeared as if there had been something more than ordinary election proceedings when the intention was changed by a letter. He then observed that the hour was late, and moved that the House, when it adjourns, adjourn to Monday. The question was lost.

It was then moved that the House adjourn now. The question was taken, and lost, by a large majority.

Mr. BUTLER hoped gentlemen would not do one thing and tell us another. After hearing them for several hours—after sitting without refreshment from eleven to now near six—will not gentlemen afford us an opportunity to deliver our opinions upon this subject? Are gentlemen afraid of argument? Or do they wish to press us to debate, when this state of fatigue renders it scarcely possible to do justice to the subject or to ourselves? As gentlemen proceed thus, he could not avoid using strong language, and must say that he conceived such conduct grievous and oppressive—it was almost tyrannical. There were other gentlemen beside himself who wished to offer their opinions, and he hoped they would not persist in forcing a great portion of the Representatives of the States to vote without a hearing at this late hour. He moved an adjournment.

Mr. LOGAN.—As the gentleman wished to give his opinion, he hoped the House would adjourn.

On this question there were—yeas 12, nays 15.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was sorry that, after so long a debate, he should be obliged to trespass on the House, and perhaps be obliged to repeat arguments with which the House was already familiar. But the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) was such that, although much fatigued, he could not pass it by without notice. He agreed with that gentleman, that there was danger of this Government being destroyed by idol worship: the framers of the Constitution foresaw and made provision against it. But there are more kinds of idol worship than one: the Republics of antiquity will bear witness, by their ruin, to the existence of this destructive idolatry. It is that idol worship, I fear, which blinds the gentleman himself to the consequences of this amendment, though in general he would allow him to be distinguished for candor and fairness, and for which he admired him. What is the position which the gentleman lays down and avows? That it is his purpose to prevent a minor faction from carrying a Vice President into that Chair. Had the gentleman laid aside all consideration of what the Constitution intended? Does it not say that two persons shall be voted for as President? And what was the object of this, but to afford the minority an opportunity of putting in one of the two? But gentlemen will say this is not reasonable. He thought differently. It was to prevent this idol worship, and to make the majority look about them; it was to prevent any one State domineering over the rest, or attempts of particular States to carry their idol at all risks. For this purpose, two persons were directed to be voted for. Your amendment proposes to persuade the people that there is only one man of correct politics in the United States. Your Constitution provides a remedy against this, and says you must bring forward two. If the majority will select two, and bring them fairly forward, how is it possible for the minority to bring any forward with effect?

He would suppose a case, that there is in a particular State a man who in every view is entitled to the highest respect, and so popular as to be beyond the reach of competition. According to the laws of some ancient Republics he would be condemned to the ostracism, and banished. This was the punishment of the most virtuous and meritorious men. They were banished because their popularity made them dangerous to the liberties of the Republic—because, in short, he was in danger of becoming an idol. Our Constitution, more wise and just, has provided a more safe and effectual remedy: no man can become too popular; for, if there is a portion of the people who are disposed to be infatuated, the Constitution provides there shall be two candidates; and those who are not infatuated can choose a man perhaps not so popular, but probably possessed of equal talents for the station. Had the Convention supposed two religious sects, as the Protestants and Catholics, and that there should be a candidate from each sect, the gentleman's arguments, drawn from the English exclusion bill, would be parallel. But here they have the right to choose two Protestants, or two of any sect; and the comparison of course is not perfect. What avails it that the minority should propose a Catholic, if the Protestants have a majority? They may select two Protestants, and the two will have the major vote.

The time was very remote, he believed, when it would be in the power of any man to wrest the power out of the hands of the people of this country; but get this alteration made, and you never get back to so safe a station again. At some future day an artful and powerful man will rise, (as has been the case in all nations,) and if, by this alteration of the Constitution, he can command a majority of votes, he will take possession of the Executive Chair, and your liberties are gone; for the people of no nation have ever knowingly destroyed their own liberties.

When a whole society has become acquainted with its constitution, changes in it are dangerous. Every change you make renders the knowledge of it uncertain to the people, and the uncertainty is equally pernicious as ignorance; for, after successive changes, is the time for an usurper; and then the friend of the people who had stolen away their hearts, under the pretence of preserving their liberties, steals them away too. But now, as our Constitution stands, you have every guard against ambition; no man can corrupt the whole people; and if you put up two candidates, the second will be preferred to the first, if there is any danger to be apprehended from him.

When we wish to promote a particular object, we are too apt to view it only on one side. The gentleman from Virginia had compressed the object of amendment in one expression—he wished to prevent a minor faction from choosing a Vice President. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) had avowed the same sentiment in still plainer terms.

It was most certainly a wise principle to guard against evil; but wisdom requires that there be a just apprehension or a real evil. He did not believe that a Federal Vice President was an evil of any kind. The gentleman had indeed talked of armies, debts, patronage, and so on, but what concern have the Senate and House of Representatives in those evils? They have not the command of armies; no member of either House can be appointed to them. The evil apprehended from these things can only attach where the command devolves upon some ambitious man, as the gentleman (Mr. JACKSON) said, above impeachment.

He was sorry the gentleman had made use of such an epithet as the minor faction. He believed, when that gentleman was in the minority, he did not think himself a member of a faction. Difference of opinion does not constitute faction; and a free government always implies the right of free opinion. He was in a minority, but he disclaimed faction.

Mr. TAYLOR had before stated that his arguments were wholly prospective—not present or retrospective—but founded on a presumption that, at some very remote time, there may be a monarchical faction.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was glad of the explanation; for it could not be supposed that he was a monarchical politician, nor the section of the Union which he came from disposed to monarchy. He would never consent to put up any man as a candidate for office who was in favor of monarchical principles. There were men enough in this country, always to be found, without taking up men of that description. But how will gentlemen reconcile their dislike to monarchy with their dislike of Federalism also? The expression is to prevent a Federal Vice President being elected: this comes nearer home than monarchism. Is not every friend to this Government a Federalist—is not our Government a Federative Republic? The habits and feelings of every man in this country are strictly Republican. He was not indeed an Utopian Republican, nor could he flatter himself that the time would ever arrive when every man would think alike. He should rejoice to see such a time, but believed it would not arrive before the millenium, and was alike the creation of an heated brain. There may be degrees of party spirit—more or less asperity—but there never will come a time when party spirit will not exist; never will come a time when there will be no ambitious men aspiring to power. In the present time, gentlemen are perfectly able to place two persons of their own opinions in the two great offices. The minority cannot do it. What is the evil, then, which calls for this amendment? Is it from a fear that the minority may bring forward a monarchical character? He would not undertake to characterize those who brought forward a man whom they never intended for that office. If they have done an improper thing, bought wit is best; but he hoped that gentlemen would not do away the salutary checks of the Constitution.

Mr. DAYTON said that, in the course of their debates upon this important question, the Senate had been favored with some novel lessons in the science of ethics by an honorable member from Virginia. Aware of the impracticability of inducing the small States by mere force of reasoning to assent to a measure so injurious to their rights, he had resorted to the stronger argument of power, and threatened them with the resentment of the great States. When the too hasty threat was thrown back upon him, and treated in the manner it deserved; when an appeal was made on the occasion to the independent spirit of the Senate, the honorable gentleman from Virginia explained it to be intended, not as a menace, but only as a more effectual means of inculcating a higher sense of morality upon the little States. He had been so good also as to give the Senate a lecture in favor of calmness and moderation in debate, in a style and manner rather singular and uncommon, for he had done it in one of the most warm, animated, and impassioned speeches, that he had ever uttered on that floor. Thus to inculcate morality in the language of terror, and moderation of temper in the style and voice of passion, seems to be the peculiar faculty of that gentleman, and would have passed without this notice, if it had not been for its effect as an example. The honorable member from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) either allured by the novelty or success of thus recommending one quality by exemplifying in himself the opposite character, had perfectly copied after so favorite an original. He had indeed done full justice to his great prototype by recommending to the Senate, in the commencement of that day's discussion, to take the vote immediately without talking, and by pointing out, in his usually concise style, the advantages and economy of silence, in a speech of nearly one hour's length. To such authorities and precepts, enforced too in such a manner, it was Mr. D.'s disposition to bow submissively, and therefore in the little he should take the liberty of saying, he should neither threaten nor rave, nor claim for any length of time the attention of the Senate. There were other considerations which prevented him from entering deeply into the merits of this question, no less than a serious indisposition, and a firm conviction that the decision in favor of the measure was immovably fixed.

Although, however, no arguments can avail to prevent the adoption of an amendment of the Constitution so fatal to the interests of a great portion of the community, yet, as a member of one of the small States, I claim a right to mourn over our fallen honors and dignity, and as a Representative from New Jersey, I deem it my duty to enter my solemn protest against the injury done to our interests and our sovereignty. But a few years ago we were equal in votes and influence, though inferior in size and population, to the largest States. We consented to give up a certain portion of that influence for the general good, expressly retaining the other portion for our own protection and security. This instrument, the Constitution, which we have sworn to support, and are now about to deface, is the new compact which that temper produced. It is the great plan of compromise between the jarring and contending interests of the great and small States. One of its most prominent and fairest features is now about to be changed and deformed. All the other amendments which have been proposed since its adoption are unimportant when compared with this. They may generally be regarded rather as operating to explain than alter the Constitution; but this strikes at that great principle, which, in all countries, has been found the most difficult of all others to settle; yet, in this country, had been considered as unalterably fixed, viz: the succession to the office of Chief Magistrate. This point, so essential to the tranquillity of every people, is now about to be disturbed and unsettled, and so important a provision as the mode of electing that great officer is to be henceforth varied according to the whim of the prevailing party, and subjected to all the fluctuations of political opinion, or the gusts of popular passion. Never was a more just sentiment expressed than that which had been uttered by an honorable gentleman, highly respectable for his talents and influence, in the other House, "that in framing amendments we ought to consider not so much what the Constitution ought to be as what it is." Paradoxical as this might seem at first sight to those who view the subject superficially, yet it is to persons of such description only, it will appear so, for never has been inculcated a doctrine more sound and salutary. It is now however, I fear, about to be disregarded in the case before us, but it cannot be done with impunity, for we shall one day repent the departure from it. You are now about to change this form of Government, with regard only to existing circumstances and present convenience or policy, and to change it too in one of its most prominent features. You are now about to reduce the already too little influence of the small States, without restoring to them the consideration which they gave for it. Let it not be believed, however, that (although perhaps blindly instrumental themselves in effecting this reduction) they will not hereafter claim an equivalent for the sacrifice they are compelled to make. When it is once established that the Constitution is thus to undergo changes in reference only to the prevailing policy or temper of the day, and the existing state of things, what will be the situation of this country, and whither will the principle carry us, or where will it be arrested? Even the apportionment of representation in the other branch of the Legislature must be condemned if tested by that standard, and will probably be shaken, or at least most justly attacked. It was never founded upon numbers merely, but regulated by a qualified ratio of wealth and numbers. An additional representation, equal to three-fifths of a certain description of population, was considered as the best criterion which at the time of forming the Constitution could be adopted; but it is far, very far, from being a just and true one now. Who will pretend, at this period, that six persons in North Carolina are richer than seven in Massachusetts or Connecticut; that they consume more or pay more into the Treasury? Yet this is most assuredly the calculation upon which that representation is framed and apportioned. Gentlemen may perhaps feel full security that an amendment to regulate anew the proportion of Representatives, by taking off the additional allowance for the three-fifths of the number of slaves, can never be carried; but they must be sensible that the serious discussion of it would produce most disagreeable sensations throughout the country, and they ought to beware how they originate and establish a principle, which, losing sight of the original plan of compromise, and regulated only by present expediency, will render the reconsideration and revision of that delicate subject, an act of right as well as duty.

Through the whole course of this discussion great art has been used by some of the most zealous advocates of the measure, to divert us from the real ground of distinction upon which it rests, and to lull into a fatal repose the jealousies of the small States for their rights and sovereignty. A remark of the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) tending to that object, ought not to escape animadversion. He averred that no law could be found in our statute book that was produced by a combination of States, and hence inferred that no such combination ought to be apprehended. The fact admitted, said Mr. D., and what does it prove? Not what the gentleman from Maryland would infer; not what he ought to prove, before the assertion and the argument can be worth anything to him on this occasion; not that such combination may not be feared if you alter the Constitution, but that it is impracticable as it now stands. The refined process established for electing a President was calculated to guard against that very danger, but if altered and destroyed, we shall soon be subject to that evil. Why is it, sir, that none of our laws are the result of any combinations of States? The reason is to be found in the checks provided against it in the Constitution. Any project founded upon a coalition of the small States, originating as it must in the Senate, would be checked in the House of Representatives; and, on the other hand, any one resulting from any concert among the great States in the other branch, would and must be defeated in this. But if these wholesome checks could be done away, where could be found a security against so great a temptation? I thank God that the Convention were so enlightened as to place the equality of States in the Senate beyond the reach of amendment. Fortunate, most fortunate indeed is it, that there has been provided at least this one sanctuary of our rights, too sacred to be approached by the unhallowed feet, or touched by the unsparing hands of amendment makers.

The seventeen States, said Mr. D., may now be regarded as so many planets, equal in dignity, though unequal in size and splendor, composing the same system, and revolving in their own orbits around one common centre; but, under this new dispensation, the greater number of them are to be degraded to the dependent station of satellites, moving in diminished circles as humble attendants and with feeble lustre around the few great planets, and forever hereafter subject to their control and influence. Judging then from my own feelings, and from my knowledge of the people of the State whose sovereignty I represent—a people proud of their independence, and high-spirited in defence of their rights—they will never willingly submit to such degradation. I cannot therefore see another portion of our sovereignty stripped from us and remain silent in my place. I cannot behold that death warrant of our dearest rights and interests about to be sanctioned, without raising my loudest voice against it, and entering against it in the name of that people, the citizens of New Jersey, my formal and solemn protest.

Mr. PICKERING said, after the very able discussion which had taken place, he would not have risen on this question, but to repel a misrepresentation. He had not said "that the will of the people was never to be regarded." He had expressed his belief that the people had viewed the subject under consideration very superficially; and therefore, that their opinion, or their will, ought not to determine the votes of the Legislature. He recollected that some three or four years ago, he had heard mentioned the designating principle now contended for, and that it had struck him agreeably, as some inconvenience had occurred in the present Constitutional mode of electing the President and Vice President, to which the designating principle seemed to offer a remedy. He well remembered, however, to have heard at that time a few persons, of the first intelligence and patriotism, say that this principle was pregnant with mischief. But he had not then investigated the subject; he had indeed viewed it very superficially. Since that time he had been a farmer, and without leisure or occasion to examine it. Thus circumstanced, he had thought himself not very uncharitable in supposing the opinion of his brother farmers, who compose the great body of the nation, to be as superficial and incorrect as his own. He would go farther, and say, that he believed the Legislative bodies who had advised the adoption of the proposed amendment had also viewed it superficially. As one evidence of it, he had referred gentlemen to the instructions of the Legislature of New York, laid before the Senate at the commencement of the session, and presenting the proposed amendment, which contained, not a clerical, or a grammatical error, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) had said, but a palpable absurdity, in supposing that on the designating principle, when each elector would vote for one candidate, by name, to be the President, that two candidates could each have a majority of all the votes!

When this amendment was first urged upon the Senate, the motive was declared to be to prevent a recurrence of such a state of things as had happened at the last election of President, when the choice came Constitutionally before the House of Representatives. The division of the States in that House suspending for several days any choice, had brought us, some gentlemen had said, to the brink of a civil war. And an honorable member from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) had told us, that if Mr. JEFFERSON had not been elected, the citizens of that State would have been ready, and he was disposed to believe the citizens of their sister State, South Carolina, would have been equally ready to taken up arms in his behalf. And were, Mr. P. asked, the people of the United States thus early decrepit, thus early corrupt, that, like the old monarchies of Europe, for the sake of one man, they would have rushed to arms, and involved their country in a civil war? On that one man, indeed, the honorable gentleman had repeatedly pronounced his eulogies; he was unimpeachable, he was beyond the reach of censure. Others, however, thought differently. Mr. P. believed there was abundant room for censure, but he should waive it. Men are often blind, not only to their own faults, but those of their friends. In politics, men differed in their opinions of men and things, as in religion they differed as to their religious tenets. Hence the poet's remark:

"One thinks on Calvin Heaven's own spirit fell, Another deems him instrument of hell."

But, said Mr. P., the great motive for the proposed amendment, at first expressed by its friends, seems not now to be relied on; while a gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) with great simplicity, has told us what was its real object: "That the majority, the Republicans, may obtain the man of their choice, and with certainty prevent the election of either a Federal President or Vice President." And a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) has suggested that the proposed amendment would finally destroy the minority. And it was by such destruction, Mr. P. supposed, that "harmony was to be restored to social intercourse." But he would quote an authority which certainly the advocates of the amendment would respect. This authority had declared, "that the minority possess their equal rights, and that the will of the majority, to be rightful, must be reasonable."

Mr. P. believed that one of the most embarrassing questions before the General Convention, respected the choice of the chief Executive officer. He had been informed by a member of that convention, the gentleman from Georgia on his left, (Mr. BALDWIN,) that it had been proposed and concluded that the President of the United States should be elected by Congress for seven years, and be ever after ineligible to that office; but that late in their session the present complex mode of electing the President and Vice President was proposed; that the mode was perfectly novel, and therefore occasioned a pause; but when explained and fully considered was universally admired, and viewed as the most pleasing feature in the Constitution.

As to the proposed alteration of that mode of electing those two great officers, Mr. P. said that, when it was first offered in the Senate, at the beginning of their session, not having then examined the question, he was unprepared to give his vote; yet, if its instant decision had been forced upon the Senate, as was demanded by a gentleman from New York (Mr. CLINTON) not now of the House, he should have voted against it; believing it safer to adhere to a rule established by the deliberate wisdom of the enlightened statesmen who formed the Constitution, than to adopt an untried mode offered at a time of party dissension, and for a particular object. He should also, at that time, have been influenced to vote against it by the respect he entertained for the gentlemen with whom he usually voted, and who, at a former session, had had the subject presented to their consideration. But, having since had time to consider it, he should now vote against the amendment, on the fullest conviction of the mischiefs which would flow from it. What these were, and how much superior, how much safer was the present Constitutional mode of electing the President and Vice President, had been so amply, so clearly, and so ably shown by an honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TRACY,) that he (Mr. P.) would not attempt to add anything to his observations. If these should have no weight with the Senate, nothing which he could offer would have the smallest influence.

But Mr. P. would attempt to trace the Constitutional mode of election to its source.

When these States were British Colonies, they had Governors and Lieutenant Governors. Both those officers were yet retained in some of the States, and in those States the designating principle had always been observed. The people gave their votes for one candidate by name, to be Governor, and to another to be Lieutenant Governor.

This practice was perfectly familiar to the members of the General Convention; why then did not they adopt it? Mr. P. would offer a conjecture.

The Governors and Lieutenant Governors were chosen for one year. The inferiority of rank and importance attached to the office of Lieutenant Governor, would naturally induce the people to think a man competent to the duties of that office, although his qualifications should be decidedly inferior to those they would deem requisite in the man they would choose for their Governor; and no material inconvenience would be apprehended from the choice of such a Lieutenant Governor, because he would administer the Government for so short a period—a portion only of one year. But to administer the affairs of a great nation more circumspection was necessary, and a longer continuance in office. The President and Vice President were to be chosen for four years. In case the office of President became vacant, the Vice President would succeed and be charged with all the duties of the President; and this might happen to be for two or three years, or even for four years, if the President should die between the time of his election and the period of his taking upon himself the Government. It was therefore an object of the highest importance to place the election of Vice President on such ground as, if possible, would necessarily produce the choice of one every way qualified for the office of President. And this would be the happy result of a correct adherence to the present Constitutional mode of electing those two great officers. All the difficulty, all the embarrassment which had hitherto been experienced, had arisen from a palpable departure from the plain Constitutional rule, from the Electors acting on the discriminating principle; not indeed by designating by name, but in their minds, which of the two persons voted for should be the President, and which the Vice President; a designation forbidden by the spirit, if not by the letter of the Constitution. If the Electors, laying aside all attempts to give one of the candidates for President an advantage over the other, vote for two men, each possessing the qualifications requisite for that high office, it will then be a matter of much indifference, as it respects the great interests of the nation, which becomes the President, and which the Vice President. The evil arising from the non-observance, by the Electors of this plain rule would, after a few elections, work its own cure. They would see a necessity of a strict adherence to the spirit of the Constitution, convinced that the true interests of the people lay in such an equal choice.

Much had been said about the interests of the large and of the small States, and those of the latter it was conceived would be deeply affected by the proposed alteration of the Constitution; but without adding to the numerous observations which had been made on that subject, Mr. P. would only remark, what on all sides had been admitted, that the Constitution was the result of compromise—of mutual sacrifices of State interests, of local wishes, and attachments, to the common good. The General Convention, after long and full deliberation and discussion, had adjusted the balance of power among the States comprising the Union, and there was great danger, by making any alterations in the Constitution, that this balance would be destroyed. It was inexpedient frequently to change the ordinary acts of legislation; it was dangerous to be often changing the fundamental laws of a State, and still more dangerous to change those which, like the Constitution of the United States, form the bond of Union among a great number of confederated States. It was only in case of great and manifest evil arising under a Constitution, that an amendment should be attempted. Such a case did not now exist.

Mr. P. repeated that the subject of the amendment before the Senate had not been well understood by the people. That it had been only on a very superficial view of it, that what was called the public mind and the public will had been expressed; and that it was therefore the duty of gentlemen, uninfluenced by the popular voice, now to act independently, according to the dictates of their own minds; and thus secure the real and permanent interests of the people.

Mr. JACKSON.—The gentleman last up has thought proper to notice what he had said would have been the effect of the meditated usurpation at the last election. He assured that gentleman, that however much he might plume himself on his own virtues, that the people of Georgia would not take their ideas of the course that ought to be pursued, when their liberties were at stake, from any other source than the principles of virtue and freedom. The gentleman had also thought proper to notice what he called an eulogium upon the present Chief Magistrate. His language was too humble and inadequate for that great and good man's eulogium; it was far beyond any form of words which he could employ, to express the veneration which he felt for him; and he believed that, excepting only the departed WASHINGTON, no man ever possessed or merited more of the affection of the people of America than he did.

But, not content with noticing my tribute of truth, which the occasion called for and which the gentleman questions, he has given the Senate what it was to be supposed he intended for poetry; he would not compliment him on his taste for selection, any more than on his liberality. The verses are bad enough, and the application worse; they reminded him of the speech of Moloch, in the second book of Paradise Lost. But taking his verses as they are, he was content to believe the first; the gentleman might, if it could console him, believe in the second. For he did believe that the President's virtues were a hell to him.

The zeal of Georgia appears to be a matter of surprise to the gentleman. But it is by no means surprising. Why was that State so anxious for a change of Administration? Under the former Administration her rights were violated, her Government treated with studied insult. In discharge of his duty as Governor, he could scarcely get an answer on public business from the Department of State, at the head of which that gentleman (Mr. PICKERING) was then placed. Under that Administration State rights were degraded and disregarded; we saw the principles of the Revolution brought up as topics for reproach, and we saw that we had no chance but in the resort to first principles. We looked up to the author of the Declaration of Independence,—he has not disappointed us. Would to God I were capable of doing justice to his eulogium.

Mr. WHITE proposed an adjournment; he feared the fatigue would create irritation; some warmth had already been displayed.

On the question being called (10 minutes past 7) it was lost.

Mr. WRIGHT would offer but a few words. It had been observed that our Government is the result of a compromise. So are all federal Governments. The reference to the old Confederation and their voting by States amounted to nothing conclusive; the old Congress possessed no Legislative power, they had only an Executive and recommendatory power. The Constitution was produced by the necessity of the case; no impost could be levied by the old Congress, and, to preserve the benefits of the Revolution, Virginia called the Convention. He could not account for the opposition of the gentleman from Delaware, as he would not strike the amendment out if it formed part of the Constitution.

Mr. WHITE.—The gentleman misapprehended my expression.

Mr. WRIGHT.—I took the gentleman's words down—they were these: "If the amendment formed part of the Constitution I would not vote for striking it out." He then went very largely into a recapitulation and reply to the various points of discussion, and asked if it was consistent with the principles of the Government that our laws should be like those of the Medes and Persians, their form immutable and error eternal? He asked if gentlemen would not think it a hard case if men were placed in the two first offices of Government who were neither the choice nor agreeable to either party? Yet this would not be more inconsistent or absurd than to have any one man so placed, contrary to the fundamental principle of representative government, the will of the majority. Every gentleman must recollect what a scene was exhibited in the Legislature of Pennsylvania at the late election, which could have its origin in intrigues alone, and which ended at length in a compromise which gave the most populous State in the Union the real value of no more than one vote; the same intrigues existed in New Jersey, where an organized plan existed to place a man in the Executive chair against the wishes of the nation, unchosen and unintended for the Executive chair by either party.

Here we provide a remedy for such evils—we offer you the certain means of frustrating and rendering them hopeless; we offer you a designation. But it is said that this is a party question. Gentlemen appear not to look around them, or to overlook facts staring them in the face. Do we not see gentlemen of opposite parties in politics on both sides of this question? Is it from party views the gentleman from South Carolina opposes it?

He was as much a friend to the principles of a majority governing as any man, but here it was a different question which he thought principally concerned—it is to prevent the disgrace and injuries of intrigues; it is to prevent men not intended to be chosen from being edged into power. At the last election what did we see? An attempt made by a party in truth hostile to the man at that time, endeavoring to put him into the Executive chair! And for what purpose? For the purpose of confusion—to distract and divide the country, and to lay the foundation of another factious Administration on one already humbled by public indignation. Had they succeeded in corrupting a single man from his duty, would it not have been usurpation of the worst species? What did his colleague say?—that after this project of wrong had failed, another was meditated; it was even supposed to set up a man who had not a single vote, and that had they attempted to carry it into execution, the people would not bear it. And the gentleman from Connecticut expresses his astonishment that the people would not bear usurpation, while he confesses that his section of the Union would have been quiet spectators of the act! He knew that the people of Maryland felt the danger and were determined to resist it, not with their arms folded but with the energy of freemen; and such was the sensation which the meditated wrong had occasioned, such was the spirit of the people to resist it, that some of the most opulent men in the State found it time to interfere.

This amendment then is intended to prevent the recurrence of such alarming dangers. Does it deprive any one or any State of a right? Is it not fit, that if I am called on to vote for President and Vice President that I should have my free choice? Is it then consistent with reason that I should be compelled to vote for one man upon equal terms whom I do not think has equal talents or equal claims to my confidence? Is it fair that I should be reduced to the alternative of choosing a wise man and a fool, in order to give the former a chance? Are not the small States as well secured by this amendment as the large? If this amendment was not intended, why has it not been guarded like those parts which cannot be changed before 1808? In this Senate the small States have their security—their equal representation, and in the provision against any change being made in their representation here without the consent of each.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) has drawn all his eloquence in force, he has collected all his vengeance, and pours out the vials of his wrath upon Virginia. Why this vehement, this toothless rage against that State, which in evil times had indeed stood firm, the rock of our political salvation: to whom we looked in the hour of adversity for counsel, for succor, for statesmen and leaders of our armies? To her we were indebted for a WASHINGTON, and is it because we are indebted to her for other great men that this jealous rage is vociferated against her? Is it to be supposed that with her twenty-four votes for President she can control all the rest? We hold the true federative counterpoise, the other House has the democratic or popular, for he knew no difference. Nine or ten are destined to be small States, and will always have a majority here? Gentlemen, when they cannot make good their case by argument or fact, endeavor to make it out as well as they can. Hence, we have the declaration about small and large States, and hence so many warnings against touching the Constitution. But who are they who wish to tear up this Constitution? Two propositions have been offered of infinitely more force on the principles of the Constitution—one to abolish the office of Vice President altogether, the other to limit the election of President. We wish to provide against an evil not foreseen, and to supply the deficiency; the gentlemen wish to tear a part of the Constitution altogether. And who have proposed and advocate these erasures? The opposers of this amendment. So, that when reverence for the Constitution is spoken of, these amendments must be abandoned. Experience, sir, is worth a thousand volumes of experiments. Had it been foreseen at the last election, that such events could have proceeded from the principles of honor and good faith being rigidly observed by the republicans, many would have opposed their uniform vote and cast their vote away rather than lay the country open to intrigue and its consequences.

He had thought the number five would equally answer the purpose of election. Arguments had convinced him that three would be still more safe; because it would give the greater certainty of a choice by the people. And was there a man in that House who would dare to say that the people ought not to have the man of their choice? They look for the security of that right, and the principle of designation secures it. Is there any man who as an Elector would prefer the uncertainty of two for the certainty of one. Some affect to say we strike at fundamental principles. But we say we wish to strike at error and give stability to republican representative principles. The Constitution says the President shall be chosen by Electors; he believed there was a militant spirit against democratic republican principles, which would take the power from the people and their Electors, which would fly in the face of the Constitution itself, and tell the people it ought not to be amended; that error should be perpetual, and experience fruitless; this was notoriously avowed. Our greatest blessing and our first pride is that we have the power and the right to amend, and to redress wrongs without the resort to arms which nations are ever exposed to, where abuses are rendered sacred and hereditary. On the subject of this amendment, so far as it concerns designation, he believed the public mind could not be better known; could three-fourths of our Legislatures and two-thirds of both Houses of Congress commit treason and treachery on themselves? He was decidedly for the amendment, and for the number three.

Mr. WHITE.—The gentleman says the old Congress had no Legislative powers. Did they not raise armies, and emit money, both high Legislative acts?

Mr. WRIGHT.—The gentleman is wholly mistaken; the several States raised armies, and moneys were raised by State contributions—all the power they had was to recommend to the States and make requisitions upon the State grants.

The question on inserting the number three was put (at ten minutes past 8 o'clock, P. M.) and carried—21 yeas, 11 nays.

Mr. DAYTON asked if the question could be taken on the whole of the designating amendment, without deciding upon the remainder of the report?*

Mr. BUTLER.—You assuredly cannot decide upon the first part without deciding upon the whole of the report, unless you do it by power; and you can do anything, as Judge Blackstone says, by power, but make a man of a woman. Power, however, appears to be the order of the day; though he hoped the Chair will do so much justice to himself as to acknowledge that we have been hitherto in a Committee of the Whole. Some gentlemen had spoken as often as nine or ten times in the debate, and in the House that would have been contrary to order. The object of his wishes was to probe innovation. If we have hitherto been in a Committee of the Whole, as this is only a part of the report, of course it will stand as it is, and we may proceed to the remainder of the report—though, from what he had already seen, he did not expect the indulgence that he thought was due to every member of that House; and it was not impossible that it meant to press into a different course. If so, gentlemen should look to what the people of the United States would say, when they see the doors closed against all dispassionate discussion, and all opportunities open to one side of the House. There was an example of this kind given by a gentleman (Mr. COCKE,) who, after making a speech of an hour, sits down and roars out, the question! the question! Unless gentlemen mean to practice the same indelicacy as two hours ago.

The PRESIDENT wished to interrupt the gentleman for a moment barely to inform him that the question has never been before a Committee of the Whole.

A desultory conversation on the point of order

*This question has reference to the following amendment proposed by Mr. Butler, for limiting the period for which a President should be elected, and which was not acted upon:

Resolved, That the following amendment be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"That no person who has been twice successively elected President of the United States, shall be eligible as President, until four years shall have elapsed; but any citizen who has been President of the United States, may, after such intervention, be eligible to the office of President, for four years, and no longer."

here took place, in which Messrs. NICHOLAS, BUTLER, TRACY, S. SMITH, DAYTON, TAYLOR, FRANKLIN, HILLHOUSE, and ADAMS, spoke a few moments each. In which it was contended that the first amendment could not be decided on without first deciding on the second amendment, which was reported by the same committee.

On the other side it was maintained that the amendment for designation was a separate proposition, and might be voted upon, whether the other was voted upon or not; that the other amendment might be called up at any time without interfering with the principle or the passage of that now before the House.

The PRESIDENT decided that the question now was on agreeing to the resolution as amended. Upon which the yeas and nays were demanded, and were as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Butler, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, White—10.

Mr. ADAMS thought it proper for him at this stage to notice some observations directed to him. It had been presumed that he had expressed some solicitude about the election of a federal Vice President; he had expressed nothing which could countenance a solicitude about the election of a federal or anti-federal Vice President; but he had indeed noticed that the amendment appeared to him as intended directly to affect the next election; though at the same time as far as related to himself he turned out of the consideration every idea of its effect on any single case; he looked to it as it would affect a century to come—he never meant to take the diameter of the earth for the measure of a barleycorn.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) had charged him with pouring out the vials of his wrath on Virginia; he was not conscious of uttering any degree of wrath against Virginia, and could not be persuaded that he had uttered what he certainly never felt; so far from wrath, he had ever entertained for that State the highest respect, as producing the greatest men of our Revolution. It was true, indeed, that when he heard a gentleman from that State holding forth what he had then considered as a menace, he had felt some irritation; and when he compared it with the mould and process of the measure before us, that was increased; and had he not been convinced that no menace was intended, by subsequent explanations, he should have entertained a serious alarm. His impressions were generally on the subject, that no regard had been paid to the permanent operation of the measure, but that all argument had been drawn from the last, and all consequences are calculated for the next election. From the open avowal of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) to the labored, ingenious, and eloquent arguments of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAYLOR,) all had this tendency and that view only.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

To the designating principle itself he had no objection, and believed it calculated to be productive of good. But when he heard gentlemen talk of the jealousy of States, he had little expected to find a mixture of argument drawn from English corruptions and degeneracy, applied to our home institutions. When jealousy of Executive power was spoken of, so much like the unmeaning noise out of doors, he had expected that after adding fifteen millions to the public debt at a blow; when eighty thousand men were proposed to be placed at the will of the Executive; when by four short lines the whole of the arbitrary power of the Spanish King over his subjects in Louisiana was transferred to the Executive, with all the consequent patronage, he did not expect to hear armies, debts, and patronage, introduced in the debate. When declamation of this kind is given, the best return that can be expected is declamation of the same species.

Mr. S. SMITH had not intended at any hour to have taken a further part in this debate; but when he found gentlemen resorting to stratagem when sound argument failed them, and words and sentiments are tortured from their intention, he could not remain silent. It requires very little ingenuity to lop off a part of a sentence, even in scripture, and to make the remainder blasphemy; though the whole sentence as written were the most solemn truth. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) thinks it consistent, perhaps, to construe words which never had that meaning as a threat. He would beg leave to notice a mistake of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) who had charged him with an open avowal that the sole object of the amendment was to preclude the election of a Vice President. He had said that it would certainly have that effect; and that the effect would be proper and conformable to the spirit and intention of the Constitution; and he approved of it for that reason; for, under the existing mode the people, who wished to secure a proper person, or that person in whom they have the greatest portion of confidence, would be obliged to throw their votes away, and make no choice of the second officers, or leave the choice to chance. But how could the gentleman say himself, or think him guilty of the absurdity of supposing, that this amendment originated and was conducted solely with a view to the next election, and that only; or that all arguments were drawn from the last election? If he recollected correctly, the subject of this amendment was brought forward several years ago, by the representative of a small Eastern State, Mr. ABIEL FOSTER of New Hampshire. At that period those persons were of the predominant party. But they tell us it was not then carried. And why not? Most probably because they could not find members convinced of its necessity. It was proposed before the last election, and that event has convinced every one who before doubted. After all, if the Legislatures do not think proper to adopt it, it cannot pass.

Mr. TRACY.—We are told this is a proposition for the Legislatures; but will its passage through Congress have no influence on the votes of the States? Will the Legislatures not say two-thirds of both Houses of Congress passed it, and they would not deem it necessary if it was not good? But here we have Legislatures prompting us to this measure, and it goes back to them again for their decision; that this is a measure, a measure in a hoop, it comes and goes whence it came.

The gentleman complains of attacks made on Virginia, it was never meant to reproach Virginia. But the gentleman tells us we must make an exclusion bill, and he tells you of the consequences if you do not, in order to induce you to pass it. He admired the gentlemanly manner, the openness and good nature, and he was certain that he never meant to kill us outright, but he will exclude us. We know very well what was intended by the bill for the exclusion of Popish recusants, and that with regard to the objects of the measure we stand precisely in their place. This was the very condition of the gentleman; he supposed a minority had no rights, beside that of being trampled upon, and he is for bringing in a bill of exclusion. He says he does not quote words; he caught ideas, not words. He has given a key for his ideas, they go to the extirpation of the sect of Federalists, as the exclusion bill went to the total exclusion of the sect of Popish recusants.

If gentlemen wish to shake the Constitution to pieces, if majorities must decide everything, why not go at once to a simple democracy? There were many who did not think the Constitution sufficiently democratical. The gentleman thinks so perhaps, for he tells us that a Constitution may be preserved while the liberties of the people are destroyed; he wishes you to go to the spirit which is democracy, and against which we guard. But he would not consent to go to that spirit for his remedy.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—The gentleman last up had insisted on two or three arguments before repeated, that he thought proper to notice him. He insinuates that we are destroying principles. But the gentleman has lost sight of the amendment altogether, where no principle is in the smallest degree violated. He has indirectly questioned the democratic principles of the Constitution; but in the course of three weeks' discussions, for the first time he had heard anything even glancing at a denial of the people's right to choose the Executive though the medium of Electors. What is this clamor about large and small States? It has nothing to do whatever with the question. The true and only point is, what will be the best mode of effectuating the choice? We hold that the amendment is that best mode. If any principle is more sacred and all-important for free government it is, that elections should be as direct as possible; in proportion as you remove from direct election you approach danger. And if it were practicable to act without any agents in the choice, that would be preferable even to the choice by Electors. But if you wish to elect A, and you are so placed as that B is elected contrary to your wishes, can you say that this is a reasonable and just process? Has it not always been insisted that the two characters chosen at the last election were equally estimable? Why then was there any hesitation? Why has public opinion, so ready to declare itself, never uttered a sound of discontent at the issue, while the nation was almost in arms at the retardment of the choice. Had the now Vice President been placed by whatever secret means in that Chair, is there a man who now hears who would not say it was contrary to the intention of the people? If ever public opinion was more strongly known on any point than another, it is on this. Nine States he believed had testified their wishes on the subject. New Hampshire, New York, Vermont, Massachusetts, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Ohio, have in the most solemn manner recommended it. If the gentlemen from Massachusetts, or one of them particularly, (Mr. PICKERING,) are in doubt as to the understanding or information of their constituents on the subject, there can it is presumed be no doubt but the other House understand both the subject and the opinions of the people whom they so immediately represent. And this supposed ignorance is a reply to the gentleman from Connecticut. It is to be presumed, if they are now ignorant, that when the amendment comes before them they will possess new lights—and that all danger will be avoided by their watchfulness.

Mr. BUTLER had allowed every gentleman to speak, though he had early in the debate signified his intention to offer a few observations on this important subject, which it was his lot to oppose from a conviction of its injurious tendency. He had gratified himself in the opening of the discussion with the expectation that the regularity of proceeding would be such, that we should never more hear the voice of menace or of civil war—words which should never enter the walls of that Senate any more than the most vulgar expressions. But the hour was late. The gentleman from Kentucky has said that you should not remove the election farther from the people, and he appears to think that at the late election the disposition to place a man not intended in the Chair, was the consequence of that form of proceeding. Whatever may be the sentiments or wishes of the individuals who vote, he could take upon him to say what was the intention of the Constitution; the framers of that instrument were apprehensive of an elective Chief Magistrate; and their views were directed to prevent the putting up of any powerful man; that for this end the States should choose two, and that as public suffrage would be common to both, that either would be alike eligible, and it was totally immaterial which—he feared that the election of a single individual might exhibit all the evils which afflicted Poland.

One observation he owed to the side he had taken in this debate: it had been suggested abroad that he had changed his opinion from being in favor to an opposition of the amendment. This was not so, for when the amendment was introduced he had avowed his purpose to oppose it. He was more confirmed when he heard arguments employed avowing the determination to remove every possibility of an election in the House of Representatives, and for this reason, that the smaller States having fewer representatives in that House, would be exposed to the corruption of any designing man, and they might be made the instruments of national ruin, as the rotten boroughs of England have in the hands of the King of that country.

If the small States then are mere rotten boroughs, and their representatives liable to corruption, is the evil remedied by this amendment? He asked if only two were to be voted for and had equal votes would it not then go to the House of Representatives as much as if there were five from which to make a choice? But the time which has been expended in this discussion has only served to render more conspicuous the anxieties by which it is pressed forward. A gentleman has asked us, shall a factious minority give a Vice President to the United States? Aye, there's the rub! He had thought that the reproachful epithet of faction, that all heat and animosity of party, should long since have been buried; and the representatives of the small States he hoped would see that they were bound by duty and by feeling not to suffer the votes to go along with those reproaches; for with that vote would pass a very material part of their sovereignty.

A great deal had been said to remove this idea of the jealousy of the States, and that it was only a stratagem set up for the occasion. Whatever gentlemen might say on that subject he would say to the small States, with the orator of Greece, "Beware of Macedon!" Beware of the great States! In this, however, there was one exception; he would exclude the State of Pennsylvania; and civil liberty was better understood and practised there than in any age or in any part of the world. He had, however, seen something very like this combination of States, and thought it behooved the small States to watch them, else they would monopolize the whole of the Executive departments; and the moment that was accomplished, farewell to the Republic, it would no longer exist; it would be succeeded by a high, haughty aristocracy of States, with an Executive moulded and accommodated to their views.

When you pass this you plant the seed of discord; the dissolution of Federalism. He thought that after a contention of seven years, with a party who he had thought abused their power, the time was come when a better course would have been pursued; he had conceived that principles would have prevailed, and that men would not absorb every consideration; but, with a member of the Convention, he would say, I hoped after so long a course of pork that our diet would be changed, but I find it is pork still with only a change of sauce.

Pass this amendment, and no man can live in the small States but under disparaging circumstances; they will have about as many rights left in society as the Helots of Greece. And why is all this done? For the purpose of showing one of the least becoming of the weak passions of man, resentment, you pursue a line of conduct reprobated by yourselves in the time of your predecessors. He was sorry the embers of party were kindled even by the very injudicious manner in which it had been supported. The best reflecting men see in this only the change of men without regard to measures; and that it had paved the way for a revival of the heats and animosities which ought to have been buried, but which may lead to a separation of the Union.

The question was called for loudly at half past nine, and put—the yeas and nays being taken, were:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Butler, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White: 10.

Upon the PRESIDENT declaring the question carried by two-thirds—

Mr. TRACY said he denied that the question was fairly decided. He took it to be the intention of the Constitution, that there should be two-thirds of the whole number of Senators elected, which would make the number necessary to its passage 23.

It was moved to adjourn to Monday.

Mr. TAYLOR said that since it was proposed to adjourn to Monday, when he should be disqualified to sit in that House, he hoped the Senate would not rise without deciding the question definitively on the gentleman's objections.

Mr. TRACY said he certainly would avail himself of the principle to oppose its passage through the State Legislatures.

The PRESIDENT declared the question had passed the Senate by the majority required, and conformable to the Constitution and former usage.

The amendment, as adopted, is as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That, in lieu of the third paragraph of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

The Electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President, and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and, in distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for the President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed: and if no person have such majority, then, from the person having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose, immediately, by ballot, the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members, from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of death or any other Constitutional disability of the President.

The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person Constitutionally ineligible to the office of President, shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

MONDAY, December 5.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the desire of the Senate, expressed in their resolution of the 22d of November, on the impressment of seamen in the service of the United States, by the agents of foreign nations; I now lay before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, with a specification of the cases of which information has been received.

DEC. 5, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform you, that the act of hostility mentioned in my message of the 4th of November, to have been committed by a cruiser of the Emperor of Morocco, on a vessel of the United States, has been disavowed by the Emperor. All differences in consequence thereof have been amicably adjusted, and the Treaty of 1796, between this country and that, has been recognised and confirmed by the Emperor, each party restoring to the other what had been detained or taken. I enclose the Emperor's orders given on this occasion.

The conduct of our officers generally, who have had a part in these transactions, has merited entire approbation.

The temperate and correct course pursued by our Consul, Mr. Simpson, the promptitude and energy of Commodore Preble, the efficacious co-operation of Captains Rodgers, and Campbell, of the returning squadron, the proper decision of Captain Bainbridge, that a vessel which had committed an open hostility, was of right to be detained for inquiry and consideration, and the general zeal of the other officers and men, are honorable facts, which I make known with pleasure. And to these I add, what was indeed transacted in another quarter, the gallant enterprise of Captain Rodgers, in destroying, on the coast of Tripoli, a corvette of that Power, of 22 guns.

I recommend to the consideration of Congress, a just indemnification for the interest acquired by the captors of the Mishouda and Mirboha, yielded by them for the public accommodation.

Dec. 5, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Messages and papers therein respectively referred to, were read.

Ordered, That they severally lie for consideration.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the law to establish an uniform act of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and report amendments to the same, if any shall, in their own opinion, be requisite."

It was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON laid before the Senate the address of the Commissioners of the State of Tennessee, being their Senators and Representatives in Congress, appointed, and fully empowered, to settle the disputes between the United States and the said State, respecting the vacant unappropriated lands lying within that State; and it was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. TRACY, BRECKENRIDGE, and ANDERSON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported, on the 16th of November last, to the bill to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments, and giving the assent of Congress to the proposition of the Convention of the State of Ohio, contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of that State; and having agreed thereto and further amended the bill,

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 28th November last, that a committee be appointed to prepare a form or forms of government for the Territory of Louisiana; and it was agreed to; and

Ordered, That Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, WRIGHT, JACKSON, BALDWIN, and ADAMS, be the committee.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, That when any bill, resolution, or amendment, shall be agreed on, no reconsideration shall take place on the same day, unless moved for by a member in the majority; nor shall any reconsideration of a bill, resolution, or amendment, take place the succeeding day, but with the consent of four-fifths of the House.

It was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, December 6.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments, reported the 28th of November last, to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," and having amended the report, the amendments were adopted, except the last.

Ordered, That the consideration of the last amendment reported be postponed.

The bill to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments, and giving the assent of Congress to the proposition of the State of Ohio contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of that State, was read the third time and further amended; and,

Resolved, That this bill pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments."

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, on the second instant, reported a bill to authorize the sale of the frigate General Greene, and a further addition to the naval armament of the United States; and the bill was read and ordered to the second reading.

Ordered, That the last resolution reported by the committee, appointed on the 22d of October last, to consider the motion for an amendment to the Constitution, in the mode of electing a President and Vice President of the United States, be the order of the day for to-morrow.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

AARON BURR, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, attended.

The bill to authorize the sale of the frigate General Greene, and a further addition to the Naval armament of the United States, was read the second time.

JOHN ARMSTRONG, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of New York, in the room of De Witt Clinton, resigned, attended.

THURSDAY, December 8.

The credentials of Mr. ARMSTRONG were read, and the oath was administered to him by the Vice President, as the law provides.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

Since the last communication made to Congress of the laws of the Indiana Territory, I have received those of which a copy is now inclosed, for the information of both Houses.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 7, 1803.

The Message was read,

Ordered, That the Message, and the laws therein referred to, lie for consideration.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to examine whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to the 'Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.'"

It was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States;'" and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 9.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday, that a committee be appointed to examine whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to the "Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;" and,

Ordered, That Messrs. SAMUEL SMITH, BALDWIN, and ARMSTRONG, be the committee.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to examine and report whether any, and what, further protection ought to be given to the navigation and seamen of the United States:"

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.'"

Ordered, That this bill have the third reading on Monday next.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to authorize the sale of the frigate General Greene, and a further addition to the naval armament of the United States; and having agreed to sundry amendments, the bill was ordered to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned;" and it was agreed that the consideration of this bill be postponed.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 25th of November last, that a committee of — members be appointed, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, further measures may be necessary for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and the French Republic, concluded at Paris on the 30th of April, 1803, whereby Louisiana was ceded to the United States; and on the question to agree to this motion, it passed in the negative.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, December 12.

Mr. WORTHINGTON presented the petition of Eleazer Olney, of Marietta, late a resident in the province of Nova Scotia, praying to be entitled to the benefits of the "Act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," for reasons stated in the petition; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee appointed, on the 27th of October last, to consider the petition of Martha Seamans and others, to report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the last resolution reported by the committee appointed on the 22d of October last, to consider the motion for an amendment to the Constitution in the mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States; which is as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"That no person who has been twice successively elected President of the United States shall be eligible as President until four years shall have elapsed: but any citizen who has been President of the United States may, after such intervention, be eligible to the office of President for four years and no longer."

On the question to agree to this resolution, it passed in the negative—yeas 4, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Butler, Dayton, and Jackson.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Maclay, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Potter Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Tracy, White, Worthington, and Wright.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 9th instant, that a committee be appointed to examine whether any, and what, further protection ought to be given to the navigation and seamen of the United States; and, having agreed thereto,

Ordered, That Messrs. S. SMITH, DAYTON, and ARMSTRONG, be this committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution that the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Executives of the several States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the election of President and Vice President, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 5th instant:

"That when any bill, resolution, or amendment, shall be agreed on, no reconsideration shall take place, unless moved for by a member in the majority; nor shall any reconsideration of a bill, resolution, or amendment, take place the succeeding day, but with the consent of four-fifths of the House."

And it was agreed that this motion be referred to Messrs. TRACY, DAYTON, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON notified the Senate that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to ascertain the northwest boundary of the lands reserved by the State of Virginia for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental establishment, and to limit the period for locating the said lands.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution sent from the House of Representatives that the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Executives of the several States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the election of President and Vice President.

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

THE VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled resolution last reported to have been examined, and it was delivered to the committee, to be deposited with the President of the United States.

On motion,

"That the Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to present to the President of the United States, for his approbation, the resolution which has been passed by both Houses of Congress proposing to the consideration of the State Legislatures an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the mode of electing the President and Vice President thereof:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Worthington, and Wright.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 13.

ABRAHAM B. VENABLE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia on the 7th instant, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers of Government, and other citizens, who suffered in their property by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. ISRAEL SMITH notified the Senate that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to amend the "Act making further provision for the payment of the debts of the United States."

The bill, entitled "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,'" was read the third time; and, on motion, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed to the second Monday in December next, it passed in the negative—yeas 13, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Condit, Jackson, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, Tracy, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Butler, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Maclay, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Potter, John Smith, Venable, and Worthington.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Butler, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Maclay, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Potter, John Smith, Venable, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Condit, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, Tracy, White, and Wright.

So it was Resolved, That this bill do pass.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers of Government and other citizens who suffered in their property by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WORTHINGTON, LOGAN, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Agreeably to notice given on the 12th instant, Mr. WORTHINGTON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to ascertain the northwest boundary of the lands reserved by the State of Virginia, for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental establishment, and to limit the period for locating the said lands.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," and on motion to strike out the following amendment, reported by the committee and adopted:

Line 19—After the word "dollars," "which said several compensations were established by the act passed on the second of March, 1799, and to"—

It passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Butler, Ellery, Hillhouse, Maclay, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Potter, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, Venable, and Wright.

And, having agreed to further amendments, Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The bill to authorize the sale of the frigate General Greene, and a further addition to the naval armament of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of John Taggart, of Philadelphia, praying the remission of the duty on a quantity of sugar and molasses, totally destroyed by fire on the 25th of August last, as stated at large in the petition; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments ought to be made in the act, entitled "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, by the laws whereof their admission is prohibited," and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise:

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, December 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, on the petition of Aaron Man; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to ascertain the classes in which the Senators of the State of Ohio should be inserted, as the Constitution and rule heretofore adopted prescribe; and it was ordered, that two lots, No. 2, and a blank, be by the Secretary rolled up and put in the ballot box; and it was understood that the Senator who should draw the lot No. 2, should be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service respectively expire in four years from and after the third day of March, 1803; in order to equalize the classes.

Accordingly, Mr. WORTHINGTON drew lot No. 2, and Mr. JOHN SMITH drew the blank.

It was then agreed that two lots, Nos. 1 and 3, should be by the Secretary rolled up and put into the ballot-box, and one of these be drawn by Mr. JOHN SMITH, the Senator from the State of Ohio not classed; and it was understood that, if he should draw lot No. 1, he should be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will respectively expire in two years from and after the third day of March, 1803; but, if he should draw lot No. 3, it was understood that he should be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms respectively expire in six years from and after the third day of March, 1803. Mr. JOHN SMITH drew lot No. 3, and is classed accordingly.

The bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," was read the third time; and, on motion to strike out the words agreed to yesterday, to wit:

"Which said several compensations were established by the act passed the third of March, 1799, and to:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Butler, Dayton, Ellery, Hillhouse, Maclay, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, White, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Franklin, Jackson, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, and Wright.

And the additional section, agreed to yesterday, was amended and adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

After proceedings as the High Court of Impeachments, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 13.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

The Director of the Mint having made to me his report of the transactions of the Mint for the year 1803, I now lay the same before you for your information.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 13, 1804.

The Message and report therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MR. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 12th of December last, a motion respecting the rule of the Senate in the case of reconsideration of bills, resolutions, or amendments, made report; which report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MR. WORTHINGTON, from the committee to whom was recommended, on the 6th instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers of Government and other citizens who suffered in their property by the insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania," together with the amendments thereon, reported the bill with further amendment; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Paul Coulon;" and Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to whom was recommended the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes."

On the question to adopt the first section of the bill, amended as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the same duties which by law now are, or hereafter may be, laid on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, on the tonnage of vessels, and on the passports and clearances of vessels, shall be laid and collected on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic; and on vessels arriving in or departing from the said territories; and the following acts, that is to say, the act, entitled

An act to establish the Treasury Department;
An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels;

An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries;

An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;

An act to establish the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes;

An act for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States;

An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money;

An act to authorize the sale and conveyance of lands in certain cases, by the marshals of the United States, and to confirm former sales; and

An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned; or so much of the said acts as is now in force, and also so much of any other act or acts of the United States as is now in force, or may be hereafter enacted, for laying any duties on imports, tonnage, seamen, or shipping, for regulating and securing the collection of the same; and for regulating the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the same; for granting and regulating drawbacks, bounties, and allowances, in lieu of drawbacks; concerning the registering, recording, enrolling, and licensing, of ships and vessels; to provide for the settlement of accounts between the United States and individuals; for the recovery of debts due to the United States; and for remitting forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities; shall extend to and have full force and effect in the above-mentioned territories.

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Venable, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Olcott, and Plumer.

And the bill having been further amended, conformably to the report of the committee,

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading as amended.

Carolina, praying the establishment of a post office at the court-house within the said district, and another between the court-house and Campbellton, for reasons therein mentioned; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In execution of the act of the present session of Congress, for taking possession of Louisiana, as ceded to us by France, and for the temporary government thereof, Governor Claiborne, of the Mississippi Territory, and General Wilkinson, were appointed Commissioners to receive possession. They proceeded with such regular troops as had been assembled at Fort Adams, from the nearest posts, and with some militia of the Mississippi Territory, to New Orleans. To be prepared for anything unexpected which might arise out of the transaction, a respectable body of militia was ordered to be in readiness in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and a part of those of Tennessee was moved on to the Natchez. No occasion, however, arose for their services. Our Commissioners, on their arrival at New Orleans, found the province already delivered by the Commissioners of Spain to that of France, who delivered it over to them on the 20th day of December, as appears by their declaratory act accompanying this. Governor Claiborne being duly invested with the powers heretofore exercised by the Governor and Intendant of Louisiana, assumed the government on the same day, and, for the maintenance of law and order, immediately issued the proclamation and address now communicated.

On this important acquisition, so favorable to the immediate interests of our western citizens, so auspicious to the peace and security of the nation in general, which adds to our country territories so extensive and fertile, and to our citizens new brethren to partake of the blessings of freedom and self-government, I offer to Congress and our country my sincere congratulations.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 16, 1804.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration, and that three hundred copies thereof be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH notified the Senate that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill in relation to the Navy pension fund.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof.

On motion to amend the fourth section of the bill, by inserting the following words at the end thereof:

"The Legislative Council, a majority of the whole number concurring therein, shall have power to elect, by ballot, a delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, and shall have the right of debating, but not of voting."

It passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Cocke, El-ry, Logan, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Venable, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Condit, Dayton, Franklin, Hillhouse, Jackson, Maclay, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Stone, Tracy, Wells, and White.

On motion to strike out the fourth section of the bill, as follows:

"SEC. 4. The Legislative powers shall be vested in the Governor, and in twenty-four of the most fit and discreet persons of the Territory, to be called the Legislative Council, who shall be selected annually by the Governor from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said Territory, and hold no office of profit under the Territory, or the United States. The Governor, by and with advice and consent of the said Legislative Council, or of a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal, the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their Legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful subjects of legislation; but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, with the laws of Congress, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, declarations, or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not be burdened for those of another. The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which shall be made, and shall, from time to time, report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress; which, if disapproved of by Congress, shall thenceforth be of no force. The Governor or Legislative Council shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor to tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with the claims to land within the said Territory. The Governor shall convene, prorogue, and dissolve the Legislative Council whenever he may deem it expedient. It shall be his duty to obtain all the information in his power in relation to the customs, habits, and dispositions, of the inhabitants of the said Territory, and communicate the same, from time to time, to the President of the United States."

It passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Cocke, Hillhouse, Olcott, Plumer, Stone, Tracy, Venable, Wells, White, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, and Samuel Smith.

The Senate took into consideration their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year 1804; and,

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

MONDAY, January 30.

The Senate resumed the consideration of their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States during the year 1804;" and,

Resolved, That they ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. JACKSON and BRADLEY be managers at the same, on the part of the Senate.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the Navy pension fund; and having amended the bill,

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to some, and disagree to other, amendments of the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes."

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof; and a motion was made to amend the bill, by adding the following to the new section, adopted as section eighth:

"And be it further enacted, That no male person brought into said Territory of Louisiana, from any parts of the United States or Territories thereof, or from any province or colony of America belonging to any foreign Prince or State, after the — day of — next, ought or can be held by law to serve for more than the term of one year, any person as a servant, slave, or apprentice, after he attains the age of twenty-one years; nor female in like manner, after she attains the age of eighteen years, unless they are bound by their own voluntary act, after they arrive to such age, or bound by law for the payment of debts, damages, fines, or costs: Provided, That no person held to service or labor in either of the States or Territories aforesaid, under the laws thereof, escaping into said Territory of Louisiana, shall, by anything contained herein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up in the manner prescribed by law."

It passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Ellery, Hillhouse, Logan, Olcott, Plumer, Potter, Israel Smith, Wells, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Franklin, Jackson, Maclay, Nicholas, Pickering, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Venable, and White.

A motion was made to amend the bill, by adding to the end of section eighth, last adopted, the following:

"That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to import or bring into the said Territory, from any port or place within the limits of the United States, or cause to, or procure to be so imported or brought, or knowingly to aid or assist in so importing or bringing any slave or slaves, which shall have been imported since the — day of — into any port or place within the limits of the United States, from any port or place without the limits of the United States; and every person so offending and being thereof convicted, before any court within the said Territory having competent jurisdiction, shall forfeit and pay, for each and every such slave so imported or brought, the sum of — dollars; one moiety for the use of the person or persons who shall sue for the same. And no slave or slaves shall directly or indirectly be introduced into said Territory, except by a person or persons removing into said territory for actual settlement, and being at the time of such removal bona fide owner of such slave or slaves; and every slave imported or brought into the said Territory, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall thereupon be entitled to and receive his or her freedom."

And a division was called for, and that the question be taken on the first proposition, ending with the words, "sue for the same:" and, on the question to agree to this first division of the amendment it passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Potter, I. Smith, John Smith, Venable, Wells, White, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Jackson, and Samuel Smith.

A motion was made to strike out all that follows the word "and," in the second division of the amendment, for the purpose of a further amendment; and, after debate, the consideration of the subject was postponed.

FRIDAY, February 3.

The bill yesterday brought up from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act continuing for a limited time the salaries of the officers of Government therein mentioned," was read, and, by unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with and the bill was read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, BALDWIN, and JACKSON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of John Hoskins Stone, late a Colonel of the first Maryland regiment, in the service of the United States in the Revolutionary war, in which he was wounded and rendered incapable of bodily exertions; and praying to be allowed the compensation of five years whole pay, in lieu of ten years half pay, together with the bounties in land to which his rank in the army entitle him, and such other emoluments as have been granted to officers in similar circumstances; and the memorial was read, and referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, ARMSTRONG, and ADAMS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Ordered, That the petition of Elijah Brainard, presented on the 29th of November last, be referred to the same committee, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment to their amendment to the bill last mentioned, and it was referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, STONE, and S. SMITH, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and making provision for the temporary government thereof; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, February 6.

THOMAS SUMTER, from the State of South Carolina, attended on the 4th instant, and took his seat this day in Senate.

Mr. TRACY presented the petition of Oliver Pollock, praying the final liquidation and settlement of claims grounded on his services, sufferings, and advances, as a public agent of the United States, during the Revolutionary war with Great Britain; and the petition was read and referred to Messrs. TRACY, FRANKLIN, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Agreeably to leave obtained on the 14th of December last, Mr. WORTHINGTON brought in a bill to ascertain the boundary of the lands reserved by the State of Virginia, for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental establishment, and to limit the period for locating the said lands; and the bill was read.

Ordered, That it pass to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the board, subsequent, to their report of the 5th of February, 1803, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the board, dated the 3d day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, and now transmitted; and praying that they be received as part of this report; and the documents were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Ordered, That the consideration of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and making provision for the temporary government thereof, be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, declaring the assent of Congress to "An act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina;" and a motion was made to amend the bill; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick;" and after debate, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 7.

The bill to ascertain the boundary of the lands reserved by the State of Virginia for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental establishment, and to limit the period for locating the said lands, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WORTHINGTON, ANDERSON, and TRACY, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House recede from their disagreement to the first and second amendments of the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year 1804;" and insist on their disagreement to the last amendment to the said bill. They recede from their disagreement to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes; and agree thereto. They recede, in part, from their disagreement to the first and thirteenth amendments to the said bill, and agree thereto under the modifications proposed by the joint committee of conference, with a further amendment to the first section, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana in two Territories, and making provision for the temporary government thereof; and agreed to sundry amendments; and on motion to agree to a further amendment, as follows:

"SEC. 7. All free male white persons, who are housekeepers, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said Territory, shall be qualified to serve as grand or petit jurors in the courts of the said Territory; and they shall, until the Legislature thereof shall otherwise direct, be selected in such manner as the judges of the said courts, respectively, shall prescribe, so as to be most conducive to an impartial trial, and to be least burdensome to the inhabitants of the said Territory."

A motion was made to strike out from the beginning, to the words "and they;" inclusive, for the purpose of inserting, "persons to serve as grand and petit jurors in the courts of the said Territory."

A division of the question was called for, and that it first be taken on striking out; and on the question, Shall these words be struck out? it was passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Brown, Hillhouse, Logan, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, John Smith, and Stone.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Breckenridge, Baldwin, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Samuel Smith, Sumter, Venable, Wells, Worthington, and Wright.

On the question to agree to the original motion, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Breckenridge, Baldwin, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, Wells, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, and John Smith.

Mr. NICHOLAS gave notice that he should tomorrow, at eleven o'clock, move for a call of the House.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer with those of the House of Representatives, on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States, within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," reported that, having attended the conference, the managers had agreed to sundry modifications to the said amendments, which were read and in part adopted; and

The Senate took into consideration the further amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to the modification agreed on by the joint committee of conference; and,

Ordered, That it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MACLAY presented the petition of William T. Smith, now a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, stating that he was a resident in the island of St. Eustatia, during the Revolutionary war, and shipped for the United States large quantities of woolen goods necessary for public supply; and which he sold for that purpose and received his compensation therefor in loan office certificates, which were mislaid or lost by casualty; and praying that provision may be made by law, that he may be enabled to fund the amount; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate took into consideration their amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill, entitled, "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year 1804;" and

Resolved, That they do recede therefrom.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and making provision for the temporary government thereof; and having adopted a further amendment,

Ordered, That the bill, as amended, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the act, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;'" and Ordered, That it pass to the third reading.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the better direction of the collectors of the respective ports of the United States, in granting seamen certificates of citizenship; and on the question to agree to the third reading of this bill it passed in the negative.

So the bill was lost.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment proposed on the sixth instant, to the bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina.

Resolved, That the further consideration of the bill, together with the amendment, be postponed until the first Monday of December next.

THURSDAY, February 9.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the third instant, the bill, entitled "An act continuing for a limited time the salaries of the officers of the Government therein mentioned," reported the same with an amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the modifications reported by the managers of the conference, on the first amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," together with the resolutions of the House of Representatives on the amendments.

Resolved, That they agree to the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to their first amendment, in the following words, viz: At the end of the 25th line add "An act to establish a Mint, and regulate the coins of the United States;" "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes; and the acts supplementary to, and amendatory of, the two last mentioned acts." They disagree to the proviso proposed to be added at the end of the same amendment, and they adhere to their first amendment, as above amended.

Resolved, That they so far recede from their other amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, as to agree to the modifications reported by the committee of conference thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof; and sundry motions for further amendment having been read,

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

After the consideration of the Executive business, and the adjournment of the High Court of Impeachments, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Mr. JOHN SMITH presented the petition of Nancy Flinn, of Ohio, stating that her husband was killed by the Indians, while proceeding with a flag to the Indian territories, under the command of Major Truman, in the year 1798, and praying that the same relief may be extended to her orphan children as was provided for those of Major Truman; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. ADAMS presented the memorial of William A. Barron, a Captain in the Corps of Engineers, in the service of the United States, praying the allowance of his account, amounting to $109 50, for extra services, in executing certain instructions relative to the Corps of Engineers and Military Academy; and the memorial was read.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and making temporary provision for the government thereof; and, on motion of Mr. ANDERSON, to amend the bill, by adding the following after the eleventh section:

"As soon as there shall be — thousand free white male inhabitants, of full age, in the Territory, upon giving proof thereof to the Governor, they shall receive authority, with time and place, to elect Representatives from their counties or townships, to represent them in the General Assembly: Provided, That for every five hundred free, white, male inhabitants there shall be one Representative; and so on progressively with the number of free, white, male inhabitants, shall the right of representation increase, until the number of Representatives shall amount to —, after which the number and proportion of Representatives shall be regulated by the Legislature: Provided, That no person be eligible, or qualified to act, as a Representative, unless he shall have previously resided three years within the limits of the said Territory; and shall likewise hold in his own right, in fee simple, one hundred acres of land, or, in like manner, possess a house and lot in the city of New Orleans: Provided, also, That a freehold of fifty acres of land in the Territory, and a residence within its limits for one year previous to its formation, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an Elector or a Representative.

"SEC. —. The Representatives thus elected shall serve for the term of two years; and, in case of the death of a Representative, or removal from office, the Governor shall issue a writ to the county or township for which he is a member, to elect another in his stead, to serve for the residue of the term.

"SEC. —. The General Assembly, or Legislature, shall consist of the Governor, Legislative Council, and a House of Representatives; the Legislative Council shall consist of — members, to continue in office five years, unless removed by the President, any — of whom to be a quorum; and the members of the Council shall be nominated and appointed in the following manner, to wit: As soon as Representatives shall be elected, the Governor shall appoint a time and place for them to meet together, and when met, they shall nominate — persons, residents in the Territory, and each possessed of a freehold in — hundred acres of land, and return their names to the President, — of whom he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint and commission; and, whenever a vacancy shall happen in the Council, by death, resignation, or removal from office, the House of Representatives shall nominate two persons, qualified as aforesaid, for each vacancy, and return their names to the President, one of whom he shall, in manner aforesaid, appoint and commission for the residue of the term; and every five years, four months at least before the expiration of the time of service of the members of Council, the said House shall nominate — persons, qualified as aforesaid, and return their names to the President, — of whom he shall, in manner aforesaid, appoint and commission to serve as members of Council five years, unless sooner removed. And the Governor, Legislative Council, and House of Representatives, shall have authority to make laws, in all cases, for the good government of the district, not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with, the Constitution and laws of the United States. And all bills, having passed by a majority in the House of Representatives, and by a majority in the Council, shall be referred to the Governor for his assent: but no bill or Legislative act whatever shall be of any force without his consent. The Governor shall have power to convene, prorogue, and dissolve the General Assembly when, in his opinion, it shall be expedient."

And, on the question to agree to this amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 5, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Cocke, Condit, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Jackson, Olcott, Pickering, Potter, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, and Wright.

And, having gone through the bill as in Committee of the Whole,

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be further postponed.

On motion,

Ordered, That the Secretary subscribe for one copy of the plan and view of Louisiana, by T. L. Boquet de Woiseri, to be hung up in the Senate Chamber, the subscription money to be defrayed by the Secretary, from the contingent fund of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 13.

Mr. JACKSON gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing of a buoy or buoys on St. Simon's bar.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and making provision for the temporary government thereof; and, on motion to amend the 4th section, by striking out the words "by the Governor, from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said Territory, and hold no office of profit under the Territory or the United States," for the purpose of inserting:

"The Governor shall lay off the said Territory into twenty-four convenient districts, from each of which the free male householders, residents therein, shall annually elect one discreet person, who shall have resided one year, at least, therein, and who holds no office of profit under the Territory, or the United States. The Governor shall, until the Legislature of the Territory shall otherwise direct, prescribe the time, place, and manner, of holding said elections, and of making the returns thereof; and in case the inhabitants of any of the said districts shall refuse or neglect to make an election, the Governor shall then select from each district one fit person qualified as aforesaid."

It passed in the negative—yeas 13, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Breckenridge, Cocke, Condit, Hillhouse, Maclay, Pickering, Plumer, John Smith, Venable, Wells, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Dayton, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Nicholas, Potter, Samuel Smith, Sumter, and Wright.

And, having agreed to sundry amendments,

Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act continuing, for a limited time, the salaries of the officers of Government therein mentioned;" and, on the question to agree to the amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Dayton, Jackson, Maclay, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Wells, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Armstrong, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, and Worthington.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH notified the Senate that he would, to-morrow, call up the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick."

After the adjournment of the High Court of Impeachments, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 14.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Information having been received some time ago that the public lands in the neighborhood of Detroit required particular attention, the agent appointed to transact business with the Indians in that quarter was instructed to inquire into and report the situation of the titles and occupation of the lands, private and public, in the neighboring settlements. His report is now communicated, that the Legislature may judge how far its interposition is necessary to quiet the legal titles, confirm the equitable, to remove the past and prevent future intrusions, which have neither law nor justice for their basis.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 16, 1804.

The Message was read, and, with the report therein referred to, ordered to lie for consideration.

SATURDAY, February 18.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,'" was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill giving additional compensation to the Governor, Secretary, and Judges of the Indiana Territory.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The bill for the temporary removal of the seat of Government of the United States to the city of Baltimore was taken up for its second reading. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, prior to the first Monday of November next, all offices attached to the seat of Government of the United States shall be removed to, and, until the first Monday in November, in the year eighteen hundred and —, shall remain in the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, at which place the session of Congress next ensuing shall be held.

SEC. 2. And be it enacted, That the President appoint three Commissioners, who, or any two of whom, shall, under the direction of the President, be authorized to provide suitable buildings in the city of Baltimore, for the accommodation of Congress and of the President, and for the public offices of the Government of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That all offices attached to the said seat of Government shall be removed there-to, by their respective holders, and shall, after the first Monday of November next, cease to be exercised elsewhere; and that, to defray the necessary expense of such removal and temporary residence, the President of the United States be authorized to accept such grants of money, lots, or buildings, as may be offered by the citizens of the United States for the same.

[The debate which took place on this occasion, had progressed to some length before the reporter entered the House. Mr. WRIGHT was then on the floor, and had made a motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in May.]

Mr. W. assigned as reasons for this motion, that it was not his intention in presenting the bill, that it should pass; but that it had been offered with the view of acting as a spur to the inhabitants of Washington to effect a more complete accommodation of Congress. He trusted and believed it would have that effect; and the operation of the postponement would, by hanging the bill over their heads, most powerfully tend to produce the desirable result of a concentration of the city, and an augmentation of accommodation.

Mr. JACKSON followed, and, in terms of appropriate energy, condemned the proposition of removal. He said he should not have believed, but for the express declaration of the gentleman from Maryland, that he would have brought forward a bill the sole object of which was to frighten the women and children of Washington. So far from the measure having the desired effect avowed by the gentleman, if it had any effect whatever, it would be to shake all confidence in the Government, to repress the very accommodation desired.

Mr. J. denied the moral right of Congress to remove the seat of Government; it had been fixed under the Constitution, and without its violation could not be changed.

Such a measure would indicate a prostration of plighted faith; would destroy all confidence in the Government, from one end of the continent to the other.

Gentlemen, in favor of this measure, should know its cost. Already had the present seat of Government, in its origination and consequences, cost the nation the assumption of the State debts to the amount of twenty-one millions, and between one and two millions for public accommodation. Would gentlemen be willing not only to lose all that had been expended, but likewise to indemnify the proprietors in the city, whose assessed property amounted to two and a half millions of dollars, and the proprietors of property in the whole District, the amount of which he was unable to state?

Mr. J. concluded by saying, he should vote against the postponement, under the expectation that the Senate would take up the bill and reject it by a majority so great, that no similar proposition should ever again be brought before them.

Mr. ANDERSON declared himself hostile to the postponement, as he was in favor of the passage of the bill, under certain modifications. He considered Congress possessed the Constitutional power of altering the seat of Government; and he believed, from an experience of the inconveniences attending the existing seat, it was their duty to change it. He allowed that, in such an event, an obligation would arise to indemnify the proprietors for the losses they would thereby sustain. This, however, he considered the lesser evil; as the sum required to make an indemnity would be less than that required for the improvements contemplated, and which were necessary to accommodate the Government.

Mr. COCKE declared himself decidedly inimical to the bill. The permanent seat of Government was fixed under the Constitution, and the power did not belong to Congress to alter it.

Mr. ADAMS strenuously contended against the right of Congress to remove the seat of Government. To do so, would be to prostrate the national faith, and to shake the confidence of the nation in the Government. He considered the proposed measure as inexpedient as it was unconstitutional; as it tended directly to defeat the object of the mover.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he should vote in favor of the postponement, because he believed, if the bill were not postponed, it would consume more time than could, at this late period of the session, be spared, without a serious neglect of important business before Congress. He expressed his regret at its introduction.

The question was then taken on the motion of postponement, and decided in the negative—yeas 3, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. I. Smith, S. Smith, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Cocke, Dayton, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, John Smith of Ohio, John Smith of New York, Stone, Sumner, Tracy, Venable, White, and Worthington.

The bill was then read a second time.

Mr. DAYTON said, he had been instructed by the Legislature of New Jersey, in case any prospect presented itself of a removal of the seat of Government, to offer, in their name, the public buildings in Trenton for their accommodation. He, therefore, gave notice that, in case the bill went to a third reading, he should produce his instructions, and move the substitution of Trenton in the room of Baltimore. At the same time, he was free to declare his opinion of the impolicy of the proposed measure. The provision of the Constitution had arisen from an experience of the necessity of establishing a permanent seat for the Government. To avert the evils arising from a perpetual state of mutation, and from the agitation of the public mind whenever it is discussed, the Constitution had wisely provided for the establishment of a permanent seat, vesting in Congress exclusive legislation over it. While he declared this as his creed, he begged it to be understood that there were, in his opinion, some rightful grounds of removal. There were four such, two of which were the following: if the place should be found a grave-yard for those who resided in it, or if the inconveniences of conducting the machine of Government should be so great as to prevent the due transaction of the public business. For the existence of these, no fault could be attached to the District. If, therefore, a removal took place on their account, Congress were bound to indemnify the proprietors. There were two other grounds of removal, which would justify a removal without indemnity, as they would be the effect of the misconduct of the inhabitants of the District. These were the evidence of a turbulent spirit, of endangering the safety of Congress, and of a determined resolution, arising from a dissatisfaction which the Government or Congress expressed in favor of a recession.

When he stated these grounds for removal, Mr. D. said, it was not from any apprehension of their occurrence. On the contrary, he believed the Government in perfect safety, and he was convinced, if any hostile arm should be raised against it, the inhabitants of Columbia would be ready to shed their blood in its defence.

Nothing could exceed his surprise at the motives expressed by the gentleman from Maryland for bringing forward this measure. He should have expected, if the gentleman wished to promote the interests of the city, he would have imitated the example of the Athenians, who, in order to make a particular fund devoted to theatrical exhibitions sacred, had passed a law punishing with death any man who should move to divert it from its allotted purpose; and that the honorable gentleman, instead of bringing forward this bill, would have introduced one punishing with death the man who should move a change of the seat of Government; so that he who made the attempt might know that he did it with a halter around his neck.

Mr. MACLAY moved to strike out the words "Baltimore," and "Maryland," in the first section.

Motion agreed to—ayes 14, noes 10.

Mr. M. then observed, that he would concisely state the ideas which influenced him on this subject. For the existing inconveniences of this place, and the want of accommodation to which Congress was exposed, he did not consider the inhabitants of Washington in the least to blame. The causes from which these flowed, it was not in their power to control. They arose, in a great measure, from the city being surrounded by seats of trade, which naturally repressed its rise here. Those inconveniences were, he believed, of a nature not to be cured by time, and, if there was no Constitutional obstacle, it would be the best policy to remove immediately. He contended that no Constitutional obstacle did exist. On the contrary, he was of opinion that it was the duty of the Legislature, in case the public good required it, to remove the seat of Government. He believed that this place would not long remain the seat. The members of the Government will become tired of remaining here, when they are convinced that the inconveniences which they experience will not promote the advantage even of their posterity. The single question then is, whether less inconvenience will be produced by an immediate or a protracted removal. He was clearly of opinion that the inconvenience of removing, at this time, would be less than at a future day. He concluded by saying, that he should not, himself, have brought forward this measure at the present time. He would have waited for more conclusive proofs of the insuperable inconveniences attending a residence at this place, when opinions, at present variant, would be more united.

Mr. JACKSON said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MACLAY) had picked a hole in the bill, and what effect it would produce, he could not pretend to say. If the word "Baltimore" had been suffered to remain, it would have been rejected by a large majority.

Mr. J. then went, at some length, into a view of the unconstitutionality of a removal, and the happy situation of Washington for the seat of the Government. He said that he was far from being friendly, in the first instance, to this measure, which might be called the hobby-horse of, perhaps, the most illustrious man that ever lived. But, once adopted, it became sacred in his eyes; and nothing short of an act of God, in the shape of an earthquake, a plague, or some other fatal scourge, would justify a removal; and, he trusted, that unless some such act occurred, this would be the last time the measure was proposed.

The time would come, though he hoped to God neither his children nor his children's children would live to see it, when the population on this side of the Mississippi would pass that river, and when the seat of Government would be translated to its banks. Centuries would, however, elapse before that period arrived.

Mr. ANDERSON said, there was no such word in the Constitution as "permanent," applied to the seat of Government; nor did the Constitution prohibit the removal of it when the public interest should require it. Believing that such would be the experience of the inconveniences of the place, that Congress would certainly remove within five years, he was for taking that step now. The ill accommodation of the place was manifest to every man; nor did he believe that time would cure the evil. Such losses, however, as should be sustained by the proprietors, he was ready to remunerate. This was the least expensive course which could be pursued, as to make the necessary improvements in this place, will require at least the annual sum of fifty thousand dollars for twenty years to come, and at least thirty thousand dollars a year to keep the public buildings in a state of repair. In addition to this immense expense was to be added, the great loss of time which arose from the inconvenient arrangements of the place, and the consequent expenditure of public money. For these reasons, Mr. A. said, he should give a decided vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. JACKSON remarked, that the gentleman from Tennessee ought, in forming his opinion of the constitutionality of removing the seat of Government, to attend as well to the laws passed by Congress on the subject, as to the provisions of the Constitution itself. [Mr. J. here read the article of the Constitution on the subject.] He said that, according to the rigid construction of this provision, it excluded altogether a temporary seat, after this part of the Constitution was carried into effect. Under this Constitutional provision, Congress passed an act on the 6th of July, 1790, not more than a year and a half after the first meeting of the Legislature, and when many of the members of that body had been members of the Convention, and might, therefore, be presumed to be the best acquainted with the true meaning of the Constitution. This act fixed a temporary and a permanent seat of Government. [Mr. J. read it.] He then asked, can anything be more clear and explicit? Does it not show, in terms of unequivocal meaning, that it was the opinion of the men best qualified to decide, that the seat of Government, once fixed under the provision of the Constitution, must be permanent? It was not then imagined that the Government ought to be travelling about from post to pillar, according to the prevalence of this or that party or faction. All the ideas of that day were hostile to this wheelbarrow kind of Government.

Mr. WRIGHT contended that, while the Constitution had sacredly and irrevocably fixed the permanent seat of Government in this place, Congress might make some other place the temporary seat.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that all that the law passed by Congress proved was, that Congress, and not the Constitution, had declared this place the permanent seat. This law, like other laws, was subject to repeal.

Mr. ADAMS wished, on this subject, to be explicit. He asked what was the meaning of the article of the Constitution on this point, and all the laws of Congress passed under it? From the formation of the Constitution until the removal of the Government to this place, but one sentiment had existed, which was, that the seat of the Government once fixed under the Constitution, became the permanent seat. As to the idea of the gentleman from Maryland, who says this is the permanent seat while Congress are going from one place to another, he could not understand it. The Constitution says, the place fixed on by Congress, on the cession of jurisdiction by the States, shall be the seat of Government. The idea of a temporary seat implies, necessarily, two seats of Government. But the expression in the Constitution is "seat," and that implies only one seat. The reason of this provision of the Constitution is obvious. As the gentleman from Georgia has very justly observed, the Government had been driven from post to pillar. The question, what place should be the seat of Government, had never presented itself without enkindling violent feelings; and it was supposed that the question would continue to distract our public councils, until some permanent seat of Government was fixed. To carry this into effect, the Constitution interposed, and said, ten miles square shall be given to Congress, where their power shall be sovereign, and that shall be the seat of Government. Why give this exclusive legislation, if their residence is not to be permanent? Would it not be the acme of the ridiculous, for Congress to go to Philadelphia, and still continue to exercise exclusive legislation here? Let us now turn to the acts of Congress, and the proceedings had under them. [Mr. A. here read the act of Congress fixing the seat of Government.] It will appear that it was the intention of Congress that this should be the permanent seat of the Government, from the public buildings erected. Thus much as to the understanding of the Government. Now, as to the meaning of Maryland and Virginia, who gave up the territory, and also gave considerable sums of money for its improvement. Could this have possibly been done under the contemplation that Congress would come here, and, after staying three or four years, run off to different quarters of the Union?

Now then, after this uniform opinion, entertained by Congress, by the States of Maryland and Virginia, and by every man who has expressed an opinion on the subject, until within a few years past, are we to be told that it is possible to give a different construction to the Constitution? If anything can fix a meaning to words, everything which has occurred to this day, unites to decide this the permanent seat of the Government. These, said Mr. A., are my ideas. On the ground of expediency, if it were admitted as applicable to the present question, I would not undertake to say whether this is the most proper place for the residence of the Government. Nor will I say that Congress could not, consistently, remove in consequence of an act of God; that implies force, to which all human institutions must give way. But, say gentlemen, if we remove, we must indemnify the proprietors. But why indemnify if the Constitution does not make this the permanent seat of Government, as it has been understood to be by everybody until this day? Where is the propriety of indemnifying the holders of property here, if this is not the permanent seat, more than proprietors in Philadelphia or New York, where Congress formerly met? This very argument, urged by the advocates of the bill, shows that the Constitution has made this the permanent seat. As to the idea of some gentlemen, of granting millions for an indemnity, the thing is impossible; it cannot be done; the people will not suffer it.

Mr. DAYTON replied to some of the remarks made in the course of the debate, principally for the purpose of explaining his previous observations.

When the question was taken, on ordering the bill to a third reading, and passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Breckenridge, Bradley, Maclay, Plumer, Stone, Tracy, and Worthington.

Section 4th—strike out the whole of the section, and, in lieu thereof, insert a new section, in the words following, to wit:

SEC. 4. The Legislative powers shall be vested in the Governor, and in thirteen of the most fit and discreet persons of the Territory, to be called the Legislative Council, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year, at least, in the said Territory, and hold no office of profit under the Territory, or the United States, to serve one year from the time of their appointment; and the said Legislative Council shall, at their first session, lay off or divide the said Territory into convenient counties or districts, and apportion among the said counties or districts, according to their respective numbers, the thirteen members of the said Legislative Council: the members of the Legislative Council shall, after the expiration of one year from the time of the appointment aforesaid, be chosen annually by all the free male white persons of the age of twenty-one years, who were resident in said Territory, on the 30th day of April, 1803, and who had been resident therein one whole year next before the election, on their producing satisfactory proof to the officers of the election that they have taken an oath of allegiance to the United States, agreeably to an act of Congress passed on the 14th day of April, 1802, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," and by citizens of the United States who may since that time have become residents in said Territory, or who may hereafter become residents, and who shall have resided therein one whole year, six months of that time next before the election, to be in the district or county in which he or they shall vote; and the Legislative Council, so chosen as aforesaid, shall have power to fix the times and places, and to determine the manner of holding the said elections, and to judge of the qualifications of the members, and the validity of their elections. But if any of the said districts or counties shall refuse or neglect to make such election for one month after the time appointed for holding the same, then the Governor with the Council, shall appoint a person or persons who shall reside within the district, and be qualified as aforesaid, to serve for the district or county so neglecting or refusing. The Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, or a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal, the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their Legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful objects of legislation; but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not be burdened for those of another. The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which shall be made, and shall, from time to time, report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, which, if disapproved by Congress, shall, thenceforth, be of no force. The Governor or Legislative Council shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with the claims to lands within the said Territory. The Governor shall convene and

The bill for the relief of William A. Barron was read the third time and passed.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill to make further appropriations for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky; and having agreed to one, and disagreed to all the other amendments reported,

Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress a letter from Captain Bainbridge, commander of the Philadelphia frigate, informing us of the wreck of that vessel on the coast of Tripoli, and that himself, his officers, and men, had fallen into the hands of the Tripolitans. This accident renders it expedient to increase our force and enlarge our expenses in the Mediterranean beyond what the last appropriation contemplated. I recommend, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, such an addition to that appropriation as they may think the exigency requires.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war,'" was read the third time; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until the first Monday of December next.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of Commissioners to explore the routes most eligible for opening certain public roads," was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill do pass, with an amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the City of Washington,'" was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, with an amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act relative to the compensations of certain officers of the customs, and to provide for appointing a surveyor in the district therein mentioned," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to provide for a more extensive distribution of the laws of the United States was read the third time, and, being further amended, the bill was passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the managers at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the public buildings at the City of Washington," reported that they could come to no agreement; but that it was the opinion of the managers, on the part of the Senate, that the bill be postponed to the next session of Congress.

Whereupon, a motion was made, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the next session of Congress; and it passed in the negative—yeas 5, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Hillhouse, Maclay, Plumer, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, John Smith of Ohio, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, Worthington, and Wright.

On the question to recede from their amendment insisted on to the said bill, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, John Smith of Ohio, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Hillhouse, Maclay, Plumer, Tracy, and Worthington.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress; and they desire the appointment of a committee on the part of the Senate. They concur in the bill, entitled "An act to provide for a more general distribution of the laws of the United States," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings in each State, shall be authenticated so as to take effect in every other State,'" was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for a more extensive distribution of the laws of the United States;" and,

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress; and,

Resolved, That they do concur therein, and that Mr. BALDWIN be the committee on their part.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of this House, the sum of two hundred dollars to each of the clerks in his office, two hundred dollars to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, each, and to the Chaplain of this House the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, in addition to their usual compensation, for their extra services during the present session; and to the two attendants, Thomas Harvey, William Roberts, and also to Michael Tilghman, fifty dollars each.

Executive Proceedings.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the joint committee, reported that they had waited on the President of the United States, and notified to him the proposed recess of the two Houses; to which the President of the United States replied that he had no further communications to make to Congress.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn to the first Monday in November next.

The PRESIDENT then adjourned the Senate to the first Monday in November next.

EXTRACTS FROM

EXECUTIVE JOURNAL OF THE SENATE.

MONDAY, October 17, 1803.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In my message of this day to both Houses of Congress, I explained the circumstances which had led to the conclusion of conventions with France, for the cession of the Province of Louisiana to the United States. Those conventions are now laid before you, with such communications relating to them as may assist in deciding whether you will advise and consent to their ratification.

The ratification of the First Consul of France is in the hands of his Chargé des Affaires here, to be exchanged for that of the United States, whensoever, before the 30th instant, it shall be in readiness.

OCT. 17, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message, Treaty, Conventions, and papers accompanying, were in part read.

Ordered, That the Message, Treaty, and two Conventions, be printed, in confidence, for the use of the members.

TUESDAY, October 18.

The Senate resumed the reading of the papers referred to in the Message of the President of the United States of the 17th instant.

On motion, the Treaty and Conventions communicated with the Message of the President of the United States, were read the second time.

WEDNESDAY, October 19.

The Treaty and Conventions with the French Republic were read the third time, in paragraphs; and, after debate, a motion was made by Mr. JACKSON, and seconded by Mr. BRADLEY, that it be

"Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein.) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the Treaty, made and concluded at Paris, the 11th day of Floreal, in the 11th year of the French Republic, (30th April, 1803,) between the United States and the said French Republic, as well as to the two conventions connected therewith, and made and concluded between the two Republics, on the same day, by Robert R. Livingston and James Monroe, Ministers Plenipotentiary on the part of the United States, and Barbe Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury of the French Republic, on the part of the said Republic."

Ordered, That this motion lie until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, October 20.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Treaty and Conventions made with the First Consul of France; and, on the question, Will the Senate agree to the ratification of the same? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Clinton, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Taylor, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

So it was Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein,) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the Treaty, as well as to the ratification of the two Conventions connected therewith, made and concluded at Paris, on the 10th day of Floreal, in the 11th year of the French Republic, (30th April, 1803,) between the United States and the said French Republic, by Robert R. Livingston and James Monroe, Ministers Plenipotentiary on the part of the United States, and Barbe Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury of the French Republic, on the part of the said Republic."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

A motion was made that it be

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to obtain from the French Republic, such a modification of the third article of the Treaty as will leave the Government of the United States at liberty to make such future arrangements, or disposition of the Territory of Louisiana, as, in their wisdom, may best promote the general interest; always securing to the free inhabitants of Louisiana protection to their persons, security to their property, and the free and open enjoyment of their religion."

Ordered, That this motion lie until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, October 21.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday, for a modification of the third article of the Treaty between the United States and the First Consul of France, respecting Louisiana.

Ordered, That it be printed, confidentially, for the use of the Senate.

SATURDAY, October 22.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made on the 20th instant for a modification of the third article of the French Treaty.

Ordered, That it be postponed to Monday next.

Executive Proceedings.

MONDAY, October 24.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before you the Convention signed on the 12th day of May last between the United States and Great Britain, for settling their boundaries in the Northeastern and Northwestern parts of the United States, which was mentioned in my general message of the 17th instant, together with such papers relating thereto, as may enable you to determine whether you will advise and consent to its ratification.

OCT. 24, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie for consideration, and that the treaty be printed, confidentially, for the use of the Senate.

On motion, to resume the consideration of the resolution moved for on the 20th instant, for a modification of the treaty respecting Louisiana, it passed in the negative.

THURSDAY, October 27.

The Convention with Great Britain respecting the Eastern boundaries of the United States was read the second time.

FRIDAY, October 28.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 20th instant for a modification of the treaty respecting Louisiana; and, after debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

MONDAY, October 31.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the British Convention for fixing the Eastern boundaries of the United States:

A motion was made that it be

Resolved, That the Senate (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring) do advise and consent that the Convention between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty, for determining boundaries, pursuant to the provisions contained in the Treaty of Peace of 1783, concluded at London on the 13th day of May, 1803, be ratified." Whereupon,

A motion was made to amend the fifth article by inserting, after the word "Commissioners," in the first instance, "upon the demand of either Government," and to add the word "immediately," after the word "shall," in the next line.

And, after debate, adjourned.

FRIDAY, November 4.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Convention made between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, for fixing the Eastern boundaries of the United States; and the motion for amendment being withdrawn after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 20th of October for a modification of the third article of the treaty between the United States and the First Consul of France respecting Louisiana.

And on the question, Will the Senate agree to the resolution moved for? it passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Butler, Dayton, Jackson, Logan, Potter, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Maclay, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Israel Smith, John Smith, Stone, Taylor, Tracy, Worthington, and Wright.

TUESDAY, November 15.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty made between the United States and His Britannic Majesty for establishing the Eastern boundaries of the United States.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. ADAMS, NICHOLAS, and WRIGHT, to inquire and report thereon to the Senate.

FRIDAY, November 25.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, further proceedings are necessary by the Senate, on the Convention between the United States and the King of Spain; and that Messrs. BRADLEY, JACKSON, and BALDWIN, be the committee to inquire and report thereon to the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

On the 11th of January last, I laid before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, a Convention with Spain, on the subject of indemnities for spoliations on our commerce, committed by her subjects during the late war; which Convention is still before the Senate. As this instrument did not embrace French seizures and condemnations of our vessels in the ports of Spain, for which we deemed the latter Power responsible, our Minister at that Court was instructed to press for an additional article, comprehending that branch of wrongs. I now communicate what has since passed on that subject. The Senate will judge whether the prospect it offers will justify a longer suspension of that portion of indemnities conceded by Spain, should she now take no advantage of the lapse of the period for ratification.

As the settlement of the boundaries of Louisiana will call for new negotiations, on our receiving possession of that province, the claims not obtained by the Convention, now before the Senate, may be incorporated into those discussions.

DEC. 21, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message and papers accompanying it were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Ordered, That Mr. VENABLE be of the committee appointed on the 15th of November, on an article of the British Treaty, in place of Mr. NICHOLAS, absent.

Executive Proceedings.

THURSDAY, December 22.

Mr. BRADLEY reported, from the committee appointed on the 25th of November, on the Spanish Convention, that the Message of the President of the United States, of December 21st, gave the Senate all the information within their power to obtain. Whereupon,

Ordered, That the committee be discharged.

A motion was made by Mr. BRADLEY, that it be

"Resolved, That the Message and documents communicated by the President of the United States, to the Senate, on the 21st instant, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report whether any, and, if any, what, further proceedings ought to be had by the Senate, in relation to the Message on the disclosures made by the same."

And it was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of 21st December, with the communications referred to, be the order of the day for the second Monday in January next.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

Mr. ADAMS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 15th ult., the Convention for ascertaining boundaries between the United States and the British Government, concluded at London, May 12, 1803, made report; and it was agreed that the consideration thereof be the order of the day for to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1804.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the British Convention, for fixing the Eastern boundaries of the United States, and the motion made to ratify the same, the 31st October last; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, January 9.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Convention between His Catholic Majesty and the United States; and a motion was made that it be

"Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein,) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the Convention entered into between His Catholic Majesty and the United States, concluded at Madrid, on the 11th day of August, 1802."

On motion to amend the resolution, by adding the following words:

"It being understood that this Convention shall embrace all the losses, damages, and injuries sustained by the subjects of Spain, and citizens of the United States of America, in consequence of the excesses and irregularities committed by Spanish subjects, or American citizens, whether being private persons, or officers, or agents of either Government."

It passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Samuel Smith, Stone, Venable, and Worthington.

And, on the question to agree to the original motion for ratification, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, John Smith of Ohio, Samuel Smith, Stone, Venable, White, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, and Wells.

So it was

"Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein,) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the Convention entered into between His Catholic Majesty and the United States, concluded at Madrid, on the 11th day of August, 1802."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Convention between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, for fixing the boundaries between Great Britain and the United States; and, on motion, to advise and consent to the ratification, with the exception of the 5th article, it was agreed to postpone the subject until to-morrow.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded to consider the motion made on the 22d of December last, that it be

"Resolved, That the Message and documents communicated by the President of the United States to the Senate, on the 21st instant, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report whether any, and, if any, what, further proceedings ought to be had by the Senate, in relation to the Message, or the disclosures made by the same."

The motion was adopted; and

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, BALDWIN, and JACKSON, be the committee.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

On motion, it was agreed that the motion to ratify the Convention between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, for fixing the boundaries between the United States and Great Britain, be the order of the day for to-morrow.

On motion, it was agreed that the injunction of secrecy, contained in the 37th rule of the Senate, so far as relates to the Convention ratified on the 9th day of January last, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, be taken off.

THURSDAY, February 9.

The Senate resumed the motion made for a ratification of the British Convention, for fixing the boundaries between the United States and Great Britain. Whereupon, a motion was made to except the 5th article; and, on the question, Will the Senate consent and advise to the ratification of the 5th article? it passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

Executive Proceedings.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Israel Smith, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Breckenridge, Baldwin, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, John Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, Wells, Worthington, and Wright.

On the question, Will the Senate consent and advise to the ratification of the Convention, with the exception of the 5th article? it passed unanimously in the affirmative—yeas 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith of Ohio, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, Venable, Wells, Worthington, and Wright.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the Convention between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, for fixing the boundaries between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at London, May 12, 1803, with the exception of the 5th article.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

On motion, that the injunction of secrecy upon the members of the Senate be taken off, in respect to the Convention of boundaries with Great Britain, signed at London, on the 12th of May, 1803:

Ordered, That this motion lie on the table.

FRIDAY, February 10.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday, "that the injunction of secrecy upon the members of the Senate, be taken off, in respect to the Convention of boundaries with Great Britain, signed at London, on the 12th of May, 1803;" and, after debate, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be postponed.

FRIDAY, February 24.

Mr. BRADLEY reported, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 9th ultimo, the Message from the President of the United States, of 21st December, and the documents accompanying the same; and the report was read.

Ordered, That it be printed, under an injunction of secrecy, for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 9th instant, "that the injunction of secrecy, upon the members of the Senate, be taken off, in respect to the Convention of boundaries with Great Britain, signed at London, on the 12th day of May, 1803;" and, on the question to agree to this motion, it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Dayton, Hillhouse, Logan, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith of Ohio, John Smith of New York, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, and Worthington.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 27.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee, to whom was referred, on the 9th of January, the Message of the President of the United States, of December 21, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 24, 1804.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee appointed on the 9th of January, to consider and report whether any, and, if any, what further proceedings ought to be had by the Senate, in relation to the Message and documents communicated by the President of the United States, on the 21st of December last, submitted the following report:

Upon a careful examination of the Message and documents communicated by the President, on the 21st of December, your committee notice certain unauthorized acts and doings of individuals, contrary to law and highly prejudicial to the rights and sovereignty of the United States, tending to defeat the measures of the Government thereof; and which, in their opinion, merit the consideration of the Senate.

They find that, on the 15th of November, 1802, and before and subsequent to that day, divers controversies and disputes had arisen between the Governments of the United States and Spain, concerning certain seizures and condemnations of the vessels and effects of the citizens of the United States, in the ports of Spain, and for which the Government of Spain was deemed responsible, and in the prosecution of which, for indemnification, the Minister of the United States, near the Court of Spain, had been instructed to press that Government, by friendly negotiation, to provide for those wrongs.

Your committee find, while said negotiation was pending, and the said disputes and controversies in no wise settled or adjusted, that Jared Ingersoll, William Rawle, Joseph B. McKean, and P. S. Du Ponceau, of the city of Philadelphia, did, at said Philadelphia, on the same 15th of November, 1802, and Edward Livingston, of the said city of New York, did, at said New York, on the 3d day of the same November, in violation of the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes therein specified," passed the 30th day of January, 1799, commence and carry on a correspondence and intercourse with the said Government of Spain, and with the agents thereof; and, as the committee believe, with an intent to influence the measures and conduct of the Government of Spain, and to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States, and did, then and there, counsel, advise, aid, and assist, in such correspondence, with intent as aforesaid.

Your committee, with the knowledge of these facts, are compelled to observe, that however there might exist in Senate a great reluctance to express any opinion in relation to the proceedings in the ordinary course of criminal jurisprudence, yet, when they reflect on the nature of the offence, the improbability of the ministers of the law ever coming to the knowledge thereof without the aid of the Executive, and the delicate situation of the Executive in relation to the subject, duty seems to demand, and propriety to justify, their expressing an opinion in favor of that aid, without which, in their judgment, the justice of the nation would be exposed to suffer.

Your committee have no doubt that precedents may be adduced, and from the best authority, to justify such a measure, and warrant the proceedings with safety, to the remedial justice of the law, which admits of no rules, or pretended rules, uncorrected and uncontrolled by circumstances, the certain result of which would be the failure of justice.

With these impressions, your committee respectfully offer to the Senate the following resolutions :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Attorney General, all such papers, documents, and evidence, as he may deem expedient, and which relate to any unauthorized correspondence and intercourse, carried on by Jared Ingersoll, William Rawle, Joseph B. McKean, P. S. Du Ponceau, and Edward Livingston, with the Government of Spain, or with the agents thereof, with an intent to influence the measures and the conduct of the Government of Spain, or to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States, in relation to certain disputes and controversies between the said Governments.

Resolved, That, if, in the opinion of the Attorney General, such papers, documents, evidence, or such other evidence as may be presumed, from any that is particeps criminis, shall be deemed sufficient to warrant a prosecution of the aforesaid persons, or either of them, that the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to instruct the proper law officer to commence a prosecution, at such time and in such manner as he may judge expedient, against Jared Ingersoll, William Rawle, Joseph B. McKean, P. S. Du Ponceau, and Edward Livingston, or either of them, on the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes therein specified." And that he be requested to furnish the Attorney on the part of the United States, for the purpose of carrying on said prosecution, with such papers, documents, and evidence, from the Executive Department of the Government, as he may deem expedient and necessary.

A motion was made by Mr. WHITE, that it be

Resolved, That the Senate will take no further order on the report made to them respecting the opinions of certain lawyers, relative to the Convention between the United States and His Catholic Majesty; the Senate not considering it within the province of their duty to do so, and that the injunction of secrecy upon the same be taken off.

Ordered, That the consideration of this resolution be postponed to the first Monday in November next.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PICKERING,

On a charge of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, exhibited to the Senate of the United States.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1803.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Messrs. NICHOLSON, and RANDOLPH, two of the members of the said House, in the words following :

Mr. President : We are commanded in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

We are further commanded to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment.

Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of a district court, be referred to Messrs. TRACY, CLINTON, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TRACY from the committee appointed on the subject, made the following report; which was adopted, and the House of Representatives notified accordingly :

Whereas the House of Representatives have this day, by two of their members, Messrs. Nicholson and Randolph, at the bar of the Senate, impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and have acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same. And have likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment.

Therefore, Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

THURSDAY, October 27.

A motion was made that the Senate adopt the following resolution :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare the process to compel the attendance of John Pickering to answer the charge exhibited against him by the House of Representatives at their last session.

Ordered, That this motion lie on the table.

MONDAY, November 14.

On motion, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution passed on the 27th of October last, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering; and having agreed to an amendment thereto,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any and what further proceedings, at present, ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of this Senate by two members of the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress; and

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, BRADLEY, BALDWIN, WRIGHT, and COCKE, be the committee to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1804.

Mr. TRACY from the committee to whom was referred the inquiry, "If any and what, further proceedings at present ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of the Senate, by two members of the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress," reported:

Trial of Judge Pickering.

"That they find the following facts, which have an immediate relation to the subject committed to them, viz: 'On the last day of the last session of Congress, two members of the House of Representatives came to the Senate, and in the name of the House, and of all the people of the United States, verbally impeached John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, without any specification; and likewise, they verbally acquainted the Senate that the said House of Representatives would in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, the said Pickering, and make good the same. And they verbally demanded that the Senate should take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachments;' and that said verbal declaration of impeachment was committed by the Senate to a select committee, who reported thereon, in the following words, viz: 'Resolved, 'That the Senate will take proper order thereon, (that is, of the verbal impeachment aforesaid,) of which 'due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives,' of which resolution, the Secretary of the Senate gave information to the House of Representatives.

"With these facts in view, your committee have attended to the Constitutional powers vested in the Senate as a Court of Impeachment, and they find that "judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." Hence your committee suppose that no power is Constitutionally vested in the Senate to take into custody, or hold the body of the person impeached for trial; but that a notification to the party of the impeachment, with a copy of the articles exhibited, is all the process requisite in the case; and that it is optional with the party to appear propria persona, by attorney, or not at all; and that after the notice given as aforesaid, it is competent for the Senate to proceed to a trial and judgment on said impeachment, whether the party shall appear by himself, his attorney, or not at all. And although your committee would not in the smallest degree interfere with the House of Representatives, in the manner of instituting the process of impeachment, since the sole right of impeaching is vested by the Constitution in that House, yet they believe the Senate, in common with other Courts, have the sole power, while acting as a Court of Impeachments, to regulate all forms as well as substance of impeachments which shall be presented to them, and all proceedings to be had thereon. They therefore are of opinion, that at present no further proceeding ought to be had by the Senate respecting the verbal impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of the Senate by two members of the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress; and that in strict and proper construction of the Constitution, there is no impeachment before the Senate, until exhibited to them by the House of Representatives, in written articles.

On a full view of the subject, the committee respectfully submit for the consideration and adoption of the Senate the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the Senate cannot with propriety take any order upon the verbal notification to them by the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress, that they did impeach John Pickering of high crimes and misdemeanors. And that all proceedings thereon by the Senate must be deferred until written articles shall, in due form, be presented by said House of Representatives."

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed managers on their part to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of New Hampshire, and have also directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House of Representatives, to be exhibited against the said John Pickering.

On motion, the Senate took into consideration the report of the committee, made this day, on what further proceedings, at present, ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering; and on motion, it was agreed that the report be postponed.

Resolved, That at twelve o'clock, to-morrow, the Senate will resolve itself into a Court of Impeachments, at which time, the following oath or affirmation, shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and by him to each member of the Senate, viz:

"I solemnly swear, or affirm, (as the case may be) that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering, Judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, I will do impartial justice, according to law."

Which court of impeachments, being thus formed, will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives, to exhibit articles of impeachment, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives, that they had appointed managers for the purpose aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to search the journals, and report precedents in cases of impeachment, and that Messrs. TRACY, BRADLEY, BALDWIN, WRIGHT, and COCKE, to whom it was referred on the 14th of November last to consider and report, if any, what further proceedings ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, be this committee.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

Mr. TRACY from the committee appointed yesterday to examine precedents and prepare forms necessary in the trial of John Pickering, impeached by the House of Representatives of high crimes and misdemeanors, reported, in part, that it be

Resolved, That, after the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against John Pickering, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation; who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of

Trial of Judge Pickering.

Impeachments, articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire."

After which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

And the report was adopted.

Agreeably to the resolution of yesterday, the Senate proceeded to organize the Court.

The Secretary administered the following oath to the President.

"You solemnly swear that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, you will do impartial justice, according to law."

The President administered the oath, respectively, to Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Jackson, Olcott, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, John Smith, Tracy, Venable, Wells, and Worthington; and the affirmation to Messrs. Logan, Maclay, and Plumer.

A message was received from the House of Representatives.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Nicholson, Early, Rodney, Eustis, John Randolph, jr., Samuel L. Mitchell, George W. Campbell, Blackledge, Boyle, Joseph Clay, and Newton, were admitted; and Mr. Nicholson, the chairman, announced that they were the managers instructed by the House of Representatives to exhibit certain articles of impeachment against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire.

They were requested by the President to take seats assigned them within the bar.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation, in the words following:

Oyes! Oyes! Oyes!—All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachments, articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire.

The managers then rose, and Mr. NICHOLSON, their chairman, read the articles, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against JOHN PICKERING, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE 1. That whereas George Wentworth, surveyor of the district of New Hampshire, did, in the port of Portsmouth, in the said district, on waters that are navigable from the sea by vessels of more than ten tons burden, on the fifteenth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, seize the ship called the Eliza, of about two hundred and eighty-five tons burden, whereof William Ladd was late master, together with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, alleging that there had been unladen from on board of said ship, contrary to law, sundry goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth and manufacture, of the value of four hundred dollars and upwards, and did likewise seize on land within the said district, on the seventh day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, two cables of the value of two hundred and fifty dollars, part of the said goods, which were alleged to have been unladen from on board the said ship as aforesaid, contrary to law; and whereas Thomas Chadbourne, a deputy marshal of the said district of New Hampshire, did, on the sixteenth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, by virtue of an order of the said John Pickering, judge of the district court of the said district of New Hampshire, arrest and detain in custody, for trial, before the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, the said ship called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and also the two cables aforesaid: and whereas, by an act of Congress, passed on the second day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, it is among other things provided, that "upon the prayer of any claimant to the court, that any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, so seized and prosecuted, or any part thereof, should be delivered to such claimant, it shall be lawful for the court to appoint three proper persons to appraise such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, who shall be sworn in open court for the faithful discharge of their duty; and such appraisement shall be made at the expense of the party on whose prayer it is granted; and on the return of such appraisement, if the claimant shall, with one or more sureties, to be approved of by the court, execute a bond in the usual form to the United States, for the payment of a sum equal to the sum of which the ship or vessels, goods, wares, or merchandise, so prayed to be delivered and appraised, and moreover produce a certificate from the collector of the district wherein such trial is had, and of the naval officer thereof, if any there be, that the duties on the goods, wares, and merchandise, or tonnage duty on the ship or vessel, so claimed, have been paid or secured, in like manner as if the goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, had been legally entered, the court shall, by rule, order such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, to be delivered to the said claimant." Yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, of the said district of New Hampshire, the said act of Congress not regarding, but with intent to evade the same, did order the said ship called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and the said two cables, to be delivered to a certain Eliphalet Ladd, who claimed the same, without his, the said Eliphalet Ladd's producing any certificate from the collector and naval officer of the said district, that the tonnage duty on the said ship, or the duties on the said cables, had been paid or secured, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, against the laws of the United States, and to the manifest injury of their revenue.

ART. 2. That whereas, at a special district court of the United States, begun and held at Portsmouth, on the eleventh day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, by John Pickering, judge of said court, the United States, by Joseph Whipple, their collector of said district, having libelled, propounded and given the said judge to understand and be informed, that the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, had been seized as aforesaid, because there had been unladen therefrom, contrary to law, two cables and one hundred pieces of check, of the value of four hundred dollars and upwards, and having prayed in their said libel, that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle and apparel, might, by the said court, be adjudged to be forfeited to the United States, and be disposed of according to law, and a certain Eliphalet Ladd, by his proctor and attorney, having come into the said court, and having claimed the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, and having denied that the said two cables, and the said one hundred pieces of check, had been unladen from the said ship contrary to law, and having prayed the said court that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might be restored to him, the said Eliphalet Ladd, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, did proceed to the hearing and trial of the cause, thus depending between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited by law, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right; and whereas John S. Sherburne, Attorney for the United States, in and for the said district of New Hampshire, did appear in the said district court, as his special duty it was by law, to prosecute the said cause in behalf of the United States, and did produce sundry witnesses to prove the facts charged by the United States in their libel, filled by their collector as aforesaid, in the said court, and to show that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, was justly forfeited to the United States, and did pray the said court that the said witnesses might be sworn in behalf of the United States; yet the said John Pickering, being then judge of the said district court, and then in court sitting, with intent to defeat the just claims of the United States, did refuse to hear the testimony of the said witnesses so as aforesaid produced in behalf of the United States, and without hearing the said testimony so adduced in behalf of the United States, in the trial of the said cause, did order and decree the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, to be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant, contrary to his trust and duty, as judge of the said district court, in violation of the laws of the United States, and to the manifest injury of their revenue.

ART. 3.—That whereas it is provided, by an act of Congress, passed on the twenty-fourth day of September, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, "that from all final decrees in a district court, in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of three hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next circuit court, to be held in such district; and whereas, on the twelfth day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, at the trial of the aforesaid cause, between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited for the causes aforesaid, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court of the district of New Hampshire, did decree that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, should be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant; and whereas the said John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States, in and for the said district of New Hampshire, and prosecuting the said cause for and on the part of the United States, on the said twelfth day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, did, in the name and behalf of the United States, claim an appeal from the said decree of the district court, to the next circuit court, to be held in the said district of New Hampshire, and did pray the said district court to allow the said appeal, in conformity to the provisions of the act of Congress last aforesaid; yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, disregarding the authority of the laws, and wickedly meaning and intending to injure the revenues of the United States, and thereby to impair their public credit, did absolutely and positively refuse to allow the said appeal, as prayed for and claimed by the said John S. Sherburne, in behalf of the United States, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, against the laws of the United States, to the great injury of the public revenue, and in violation of the solemn oath which he had taken to administer equal and impartial justice.

ART. 4.—That whereas, for the due, faithful, and impartial administration of justice, temperance and sobriety are essential qualities in the character of a judge, yet the said John Pickering, being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits, on the eleventh and twelfth days of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, being then judge of the district court, in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear upon the bench of the said court, for the purpose of administering justice, in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of inebriating liquors; and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all the good citizens of the United States, and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors, disgraceful to his own character as a judge, and degrading to the honor and dignity of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment, against the said John Pickering, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make to the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said John Pickering may be put to answer the said high crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given, as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Signed by order and in behalf of the House.

NATHANIEL MACON, Speaker.

JOHN BECKLEY, Clerk.

He then delivered the articles at the table; whereupon,

The PRESIDENT notified the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House of Representatives. And they withdrew.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

THURSDAY, January 5.

The PRESIDENT administered the oath prescribed to Mr. DAYTON.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock on Monday.

MONDAY, January 9.

The oath prescribed was administered to Messrs. NICHOLAS, STONE, and WHITE.

Trial of Judge Pickering.

Mr. TRACY reported from the committee appointed on the 3d instant to examine precedents, and to prepare the forms necessary in the trial of John Pickering, impeached by the House of Representatives of high crimes and misdemeanors; and the report was read.

Ordered, That it be printed for the use of the members.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 10.

The Court took into consideration the report of the committee made yesterday; and, after discussion, and agreeing that the words "Michael McClary, Esq., marshal of the district of New Hampshire," in the first resolution, should be struck out,

Ordered, That the report be recommitted to the original committee, further to report thereon.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed on the 3d instant to examine precedents, and to prepare the forms necessary in the trial of John Pickering, impeached by the House of Representatives of high crimes and misdemeanors, made report in part, which was read; and, after progress,

The Court adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, January 12.

The Court resumed the consideration of the report made yesterday.

On motion, to fill the second blank in the form of the writ of summons, prescribing the day on which the defendant shall appear, with the words "second Tuesday of December next," it passed in the negative—yeas 6, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Condit, Jackson, Plumer, and Samuel Smith.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Olcott, Pickering, Potter, I. Smith, John Smith, Tracy, Venable, Wells, White, and Worthington.

On motion, it was agreed to fill the blank with the words, "second day of March next."

On motion, it was agreed to fill the blank in the clause of the report providing that the Secretary of the Senate advance a sum of money out of the contingent fund, towards the travelling expenses of the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the words "two hundred dollars."

And the report having been further amended, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That a summons issue, directed to the said John Pickering, in the form following:

United-States of America—set:

The Senate of the United States of America, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, to John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, greeting:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States of America did, on the fourth day of January, exhibit to the Senate, then sitting as a Court of Impeachments, articles of impeachment against you the said John Pickering, charging you with high crimes and misdemeanors, therein specially set forth in the words following, viz: [Here insert the articles] And did demand that you the said John Pickering should be put to answer the accusations of high crimes and misdemeanors, as set forth in said articles; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, might be thereupon had, as are agreeable to law and justice. You, the said John Pickering, are therefore hereby summoned to be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, at their chamber in the City of Washington, on the second day of March next, then and there to answer to the said articles of impeachment, and then and there to abide by, obey, and perform, such orders and judgments as the Senate of the United States, acting in their said capacity of a Court of Impeachments, shall make in the premises, according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States. Hereof you are not to fail.

Witness, AARON BURR, Vice President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the City of Washington, this 12th day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which summons shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate, and sealed with their seal, and served by James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, who shall serve the same pursuant to the directions given in the next following resolution;

2d Resolved, That a precept shall be endorsed on said writ of summons, in the form following, viz:

United States of America. ss.

The Senate of the United States, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, to James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, greeting: You are hereby commanded to deliver to and leave with John Pickering, Esq., district judge of the district of New Hampshire, if to be found, a true and attested copy of the within writ of summons, together with a like copy of this precept, showing him both; or in case he cannot with convenience be found, you are to leave true and attested copies of the said summons and precept at his usual place of residence; and in which ever way you perform the service, let it be done at least thirty days before the appearance day mentioned in the said writ of summons. Fail not, and make return of this writ of summons and precept, with your proceedings thereon endorsed, on or before the appearance day therein mentioned in said writ of summons. Witness, AARON BURR, Vice President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the City of Washington, this 12th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which precept shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate, and sealed with their seal.

3d. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the necessary expenses arising upon the process aforesaid, after the same shall be allowed by the President of the Senate for the time being, out of the fund appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, and the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to advance, out of said fund, to said James Mathers, for his travelling expenses, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be by said James Mathers accounted for in a final settlement for his services.

Trial of Judge Pickering.

4th. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do acquaint the House of Representatives of the foregoing resolutions, and deliver to them a copy of the same.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee last mentioned, further reported, in part, and the report was amended, as follows:

Resolved, That whenever application shall be made to the Secretary of the Senate for a subpoena or subpoenas for witnesses, by the House of Representatives, either by their managers of the impeachment, or in any other proper way, or by the party impeached, or his counsel, acknowledged as such, by the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachments, he shall issue to such applicant a subpoena, or subpoenas, in the following form, viz:

To [here name the witnesses and residence] Greeting: You and each of you are hereby commanded, laying aside all excuses, to appear before the Senate of the United States, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, on the — day of —, at the Senate Chamber, in the City of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before said Court of Impeachments for trial, in which the House of Representatives have impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors. Fail not. Witness, AARON BURN, Vice President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the City of Washington, this — day of —, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal.

Which subpoenas shall be directed in every case to the marshal of the districts where such witnesses reside, to serve and return.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do issue twelve subpoenas for witnesses, in the above form, for the use of the said Pickering, with blanks therein for such witnesses as he the said Pickering may think proper to summon, which subpoenas shall be delivered by the Sergeant-at-Arms to him at the time he shall serve the summons aforesaid, on the said Pickering.

On the question to adopt this report, as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Tracy, Wells, White, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Plumer, and Venable.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay these resolutions before the House of Representatives.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 13.

Form of direction to the Marshal for the service of the subpoena.

[L. S.] The Senate of the United States of America, sitting as a Court of Impeachments: To the Marshal of the district of —

You are hereby commanded to serve and return the within subpoena according to law.

Dated at Washington, this — day of —, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

[From January 13 to February 9 the Court met and adjourned, without transacting any business.]

THURSDAY, February 9.

The following return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, on the summons issued against John Pickering, was filed; also, his return of the subpoena served upon Michael McClary, to wit:

United States of America, ss.

I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within summons, did proceed to the house of the within named John Pickering, on the twenty-fifth day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, and did then and there leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, together with a true copy of the articles of impeachment annexed, with him the said John Pickering.

JAMES MATHERS.

United States of America, ss.

I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, did, on the twenty-sixth day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, proceed to the house of the within named Michael McClary, and served this subpoena by reading the same, and leaving with him a copy thereof.

JAMES MATHERS.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock on Monday next.

MONDAY, February 20.

The returns of the Sergeant-at-Arms on the writ against John Pickering was read; also, the return on the subpoena issued in the case of Michael McClary, marshal of the district of New Hampshire.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock on Monday next.

[The Court met daily, but no business reported on the Record till]

THURSDAY, March 1.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed to examine precedents, and to prepare the forms necessary in the trial of John Pickering, made a report, which was in part adopted.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

FRIDAY, March 2.

The PRESIDENT administered the oaths prescribed to Messrs. JOHN SMITH of New York, SUMTER, and WRIGHT.

The report of the committee, appointed to examine precedents, and to prepare forms necessary in the trial of John Pickering, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors was resumed, and sundry amendments agreed to; and the report was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate shall direct all the forms of proceeding, while the Senate are sitting as a Court of Impeachments, as to opening, adjourning, and all forms during the session, not otherwise specially provided for by the Senate.

Trial of Judge Pickering.

And that the President of the Senate be requested to direct the preparations in the Senate Chamber for the accommodation of the Senate while sitting as a Court, and for the reception and accommodation of the parties to the impeachment, their counsel, witnesses, &c.

And that he be authorized to direct the employment of the marshal, or any officer, or officers, of the District of Columbia, during the session of the Court of Impeachments, whose services he may think requisite, and which can be obtained for the purpose.

And all the expenses arising under this resolution, after being first allowed by the President of the Senate, shall be paid by the Secretary, out of the fund appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress.

Resolved, That, on the second day of March instant, at one o'clock, the Legislative and Executive business of the Senate be postponed, and that the Court of Impeachments shall then be opened. After which, the process, which, on the twelfth day of January last, was directed to be issued and served on John Pickering, and the return thereon, shall be read. And the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer, in the following form, to wit:

"I, James Mathers, do solemnly swear, that the return made and subscribed by me, upon the process issued on the twelfth day of January last, by the Senate of the United States, against John Pickering, is truly made, and that I have performed said services as there described. So help me God."

Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

The Secretary shall then give notice to the House of Representatives, that the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, are ready to proceed upon the impeachment of John Pickering, in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon said impeachment. And upon the attendance of the House of Representatives, their managers, or any person, or persons admitted to appear for the impeachment, the said John Pickering shall be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself, or if by agent or attorney—naming the person appearing, and the capacity in which he appears. If he does not appear, either personally or by agent or attorney, the same shall be recorded. All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the President of the Senate, and, if he shall require it, shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table; and, after the parties shall be heard upon such motion, the Senate shall retire to the adjoining committee room for consideration, if one-third of the members present shall require it; but all decisions shall be had in open court, by ayes and noes, and without debate, which shall be entered on the records.

Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, viz: "I, A B, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) that the evidence I shall give to this court in the case now depending shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help me God."

Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross examined in the usual form.

If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn and give his testimony standing in his place.

If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the President.

The summons to John Pickering was read, together with the return made thereon by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the oath prescribed was administered to the returning officer by the Secretary.

Subpœnas having been issued in the form prescribed, and directed for service to the marshal of the district of New Hampshire, upon Joseph Whipple, John S. Sherburne, Jonathan Steele, Richard Cutts Shannon, Thomas Chadbourne, Edward Hart, and Ebenezer Chadwick, the following return was made to them respectively:

NEW HAMPSHIRE DISTRICT, ss.

January 28, 1804.

Pursuant to this precept, I have served the same by reading it to the within named Ebenezer Chadwick, &c.

MICHAEL M'CLARY,

Marshal for the New Hampshire district.

Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, are ready to proceed upon the impeachment of John Pickering, in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives; and that the Secretary communicate a copy of the regulations agreed on to that House.

Whereupon, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives attended; and the said John Pickering was three times called, to answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, but came not.

A petition of Jacob S. Pickering, son of John Pickering, and a letter from Robert G. Harper, enclosed to the Vice President, were submitted by him to the court, and read as follows:

Petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

At a Court of Impeachments holden before the honorable the Senate of the United States of America, sitting in their capacity of a High Court of Impeachment at the City of Washington, on the second day of March, 1804:

The House of Representatives of the United States, vs. John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire:

Jacob S. Pickering, of Portsmouth, in the district of New Hampshire, and son of the said John Pickering, against whom articles of impeachment have been exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, conceives it his duty most respectfully to state to this high and honorable Court, the real situation of the said John Pickering, the facts and circumstances relative to said articles, wherein he stands charged of supposed high crimes and misdemeanors, and to request that this court would grant him such term of time as they shall think fit and reasonable to substantiate this statement.

Your petitioner will be able to show that, at the time when the crimes wherewith the said John stands charged, are supposed to have been committed, the said John was, and for more than two years before, and ever since has been, and now is, insane, his mind wholly deranged, and altogether incapable of transacting any kind of business which requires the exercise of judgment, or the faculties of reason; and, therefore, that the said John Pickering is incapable of corruption of judgment, no subject of impeachment, or amenable to any tribunal for his actions.

That this derangement has been constant and permanent, every day of his life completely demonstrating his insanity; every attempt for his relief, which has been prescribed by the Faculty, who have been consulted on his case, has proved unavailing, and his disorder has baffled all medical aid.

Your petitioner is well aware that the most conclusive evidence of the foregoing fact would result from an actual view of the respondent, which unfortunately, by reason of his great infirmities cannot now be, but at the hazard of his life—he is wholly unable at this inclement season to support the fatigue of so long a journey; yet if the respondent's life be spared, and his health in any degree restored, it will be the endeavor of your petitioner, that the said John shall make his personal appearance before this honorable court at any future day they shall think proper to assign.

Your petitioner will be able to show, any pretence to the contrary notwithstanding, that the decisions made in the cause stated in the first article of impeachment, although not the result of reflection, or grounded on any deductions of reason, were, nevertheless, correct, perfectly consonant to the principles of justice, and conformable to the laws of the land; and the refusal of the said judge to grant the appeal claimed by the said John S. Sherburne, in behalf of the United States, was not against law, or to the injury of the public revenue, as the third article of the impeachment supposes; there being no law to warrant such appeal in such a case.

While, with deep humility, your petitioner admits and greatly laments the indecorous and improper expressions used by the said judge on the seat of justice, as mentioned in the last article of impeachment, he will clearly evince the injustice of that part thereof which respects his moral character, and show abundantly, that from his youth upward, through a long, laborious, and useful life, and until he was visited by the most awful dispensation of Providence, and the most deplorable of all human calamities, the loss of reason, he was unexceptionable in his morals, remarkable for the purity of his language, and the correctness of his habits, and the deviations in these particulars now complained of, are irresistible evidence of the deranged state of his mind.

When this high and honorable Court shall take into their consideration the situation of this respondent, oppressed with infirmity, incapable of making arrangements for his defence, the inclemency of the season, his great distance from the place of trial, and the shortness of notice—when your honors reflect on the high and atrocious crime with which he stands charged; in the decision of which is involved, not his life, (indeed his remains of life would be but a slender sacrifice,) but that which, to an honest mind, is more dear than life itself, his good name—when you advert to the consequences attached to a conviction; the indelible stigma which will befall a numerous family whose only patrimony was the unsullied reputation of their parent, which they have ever cherished, and of which they fondly, perhaps too fondly, hoped, no time, or circumstance, or adverse fortune could deprive them—when your honors shall think of these things, your petitioner has strong confidence that the wisdom and justice of this Court will permit a respondent, whose integrity until now has been unexpected; who has sustained offices high and honorable, through a long life, and the general tenor of whose character and conduct has hitherto furnished him with a coat of armor against the assaults of his enemies, but who is now incapable of defending himself, to be defended by his friends.

Audi alteram partem is a maxim held in reverence wherever liberty yet remains. The Senate of America will be the last tribunal on earth that will cease to respect it; they will never condemn unheard; they will never refuse time for a full and impartial trial.

That time, that impartial trial, your petitioner prays for; the charity of the law presumes the innocence of the respondent; and your petitioner, also, respectfully entreats that, in the meantime, and more especially as the evidence on which the impeachment is founded, was taken ex parte, no unfavorable impressions may be made on the minds of this honorable Court, by any report or extra-judicial representations which may have been made on the subject before them.

JACOB S. PICKERING.

Letter of Robert G. Harper.

SIR: Mr. Jacob S. Pickering, the son of Judge Pickering of New Hampshire, has forwarded to me, through one of his friends here, the enclosed petition, with a request that I will lay it before the Court of Impeachments, and will appear on his part, if permitted, and support the prayer of it. I am also furnished with several depositions, showing that Judge Pickering, from bodily infirmity, and total derangement of mind, is wholly incapable of appearing before the Court at this time, of making a defence, or of giving authority to any person to appear for him.

The process of subpoena heretofore issued by the Court not being compulsory, and Judge Pickering's narrow circumstances not enabling his son to defray the expenses of the witnesses whose testimony it is important for him to produce, it was judged necessary to serve the subpoena. The object of the petition is to obtain a postponement of the trial, and either compulsory process, or an order to take depositions, which may be received in evidence. Be pleased, sir, to lay the petition before the Court, and to inform me whether I shall be received to appear on the part of the petitioner, Mr. Jacob S. Pickering, in its support. In that case I will attend in the capacity of agent or counsel for the petitioner, and submit to the Court the reasons and proofs with which I am furnished in support of his application.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient very humble servant,

ROBERT G. HARPER.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

The PRESIDENT inquired if Mr. HARPER was in Court, and invited him to a seat within the bar, which, having taken, he made the following address:

Mr. President: Before I proceed to address this honorable Court in the case now before it, I think it proper to repeat explicitly what is stated in the letter just now read, that I do not appear as the counsel, agent, or attorney of Judge Pickering, or by virtue of any authority derived from him, he being in a state of absolute and long-continued insanity, can neither appear himself nor authorize another to appear for him. I present myself to this honorable Court, at the request of

Trial of Judge Pickering.

Jacob S. Pickering, son of Judge Pickering, stating his father's insanity, and praying that time may be allowed for collecting and producing complete proof of the melancholy fact. This application for postponement I am prepared to support by depositions now in my possession; and it is also my intention, if permitted, to make a further application on the part of Judge Pickering, for compulsory process to compel the attendance of such witnesses as it may be necessary to produce in proof of the fact of insanity, or for an order to take their depositions in writing on interrogatories, and notice to the prosecutors.

It rests with this honorable Court whether it will receive such an application, and hear counsel so appearing in its support.

After a short pause, Mr. HARPER again rose and inquired, whether his appearance in support of the petition would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering, by counsel?

The PRESIDENT answered, he presumed that it would not be so construed.

Mr. NICHOLAS, in behalf of the managers, objected to the hearing of Mr. HARPER, in any other capacity than as counsel of the accused; and remarked, that, as Mr. HARPER disclaimed appearing in that capacity, he could not, in his opinion, be heard.

Several additional remarks, to the same point, were made by Messrs. G. W. CAMPBELL, EARLY, and J. RANDOLPH.

Mr. RODNEY.—Mr. President; I rise to make a few observations on this case, in addition to those which have fallen from my colleagues who have preceded me; and to submit to the consideration of this Court remarks which have suggested themselves to my mind, on the application made, at the present stage of this business.

I understand the President as having declared that, agreeably to the rules of proceeding adopted by the Senate, no person can be heard in this case but the accused, or his agent or counsel. I believe I have correctly understood what was expressed, (the Vice President nodded assent; ) I also understand the gentleman who appeared on this occasion, as clearly and explicitly stating, that he does not appear as the counsel of Mr. Pickering, nor does he wish it so to be understood. That gentleman has informed us in a very fair and candid manner of the only character in which he does appear, and has assumed very properly and correctly the only ground upon which he wishes to stand. He has in positive terms disavowed the idea of his being the agent or counsel of the accused, because he has protested against Mr. Pickering's being affected by any act done by him. On this single ground then, I respectfully submit whether it would be proper to hear the gentleman under these circumstances, and whether it be not manifested that he does not come within the rules laid down by the Senate for the government of this High Court of Impeachments.

But if the gentleman is to be heard on this subject in the anomalous character in which he appears, with a view of postponing the proceedings of this Court, it will first be necessary for the Court to decide that the case is properly before them, agreeably to the rules which have been established. If no appearance in person nor by attorney has been entered, unless proceedings have been had which they shall consider tantamount to an appearance, there is no cause regularly in Court, and it would be idle for any person to talk of postponing the consideration of that which really was not before the Court. A question of this kind must, from the nature of it, ever be incidental to the principal or main question. When a writ is in court according to the rules of the court, a motion for postponement may with propriety, if the circumstances justify it, be made. This must always be a subsequent consideration, after the court are in full possession of the case. Agreeably to the correct course of proceeding in ordinary courts, until bail and appearance, there can be no case in court. The party has no day given him, because he is, until this takes place, considered to be out of Court; nor would any counsel, though duly authorized, be heard in his behalf. There has in his case, then, been no appearance in person or by agent or counsel. The accused has made default, and no agent or attorney has been recorded for him. Surely then his default should be first recorded, and if the Court consider that after his having been duly served, and making default, they will proceed to a hearing and determination of the principal question, it will then be proper to listen to those which are necessarily incidental. It will be at this stage of the business competent for the Court, if at all, to hear the gentleman. But I am decidedly of opinion, there is no period in which it will be proper so to do, unless he claims this right as the agent or counsel of the accused. In that capacity he has a right to be heard—and in that capacity alone. Our Constitution has wisely secured to every man this privilege, and I would not deprive the humblest object in the community of this inestimable benefit. I flatter myself, therefore, that this honorable Court will adhere strictly to the rules which they have prescribed for themselves, and that they will for these reasons, and those which have been assigned by my colleague, refuse the present application.

Mr. HARPER inquired, whether it would be regular in him to reply to these remarks?

The PRESIDENT said, it would not; and immediately after put the question to the Senate, whether Mr. HARPER should be heard in support of the prayer of the petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

Whereupon the Senate retired to a private chamber; from which they returned about three o'clock, when the PRESIDENT advised the managers that the Senate would take further time to consider the question before them, and would make them acquainted with their decision.

During the ensuing day and Monday, the Senate were engaged in private debate on granting the prayer of the petition; about four o'clock of the last day their doors were opened, and the sense of the Senate taken on the following question:

On the question, "Will the Court hear evidence-and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering, upon the suggestion contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the letter of R. G. HARPER.

It was decided in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Logan, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Israel Smith, John Smith of Ohio, John Smith of New York, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Armstrong, Breckenridge, Cocke, Jackson, Nicholas, Potter, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, Worthington, and Wright.

Resolved, That, on the motion made and seconded, the Court shall retire to the adjoining committee room, if one-third of the Senators present shall require it.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock the next day.

TUESDAY, March 6.

The Court was opened, and the managers of the impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, against John Pickering, attended.

MR. HARPER also attended.

The PRESIDENT informed MR. HARPER, that the Court will hear evidence and counsel, respecting the insanity of John Pickering, upon the suggestion contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the letter of R. G. HARPER.

MR. NICHOLSON, in behalf of the managers, said he was instructed to ask for the reading of the proceedings of the Court on the last day of its sitting.

The Clerk having read the record, by which it appeared that John Pickering had been called three times without appearing,

MR. NICHOLSON inquired at what point of time it was intended that MR. HARPER should be heard, and whether this was to be a step preliminary to the trial.

The PRESIDENT said, he could not undertake to give an explanation of the proceedings of the Senate, adding that their meaning must be gathered from the proceedings themselves.

MR. NICHOLSON then said that he begged leave to state that the managers were ready to proceed with the trial of the articles preferred by the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT said that, under the decision of the Senate, it had been determined, in the first instance, to hear MR. HARPER in support of the petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

MR. NICHOLSON said, he was instructed by the managers again to state, that they were ready to support the articles of impeachment. They, however, not being at present under the consideration of the Senate, they did not consider themselves under any obligation to discuss a preliminary question raised by a third person, unauthorized by the person charged. He was therefore instructed to state to the Senate, that the managers would, under these circumstances, retire, and take the opinion of the House of Representatives respecting their further procedure.

The managers thereupon retired.

MR. WRIGHT moved that the Senate should withdraw to their private chamber.

Motion lost—ayes 6.

MR. JACKSON submitted to the Senate, whether it would not be proper to delay all further proceedings until they should hear from the managers of the House of Representatives.

Apparently, with this view, MR. ADAMS moved an adjournment.

Lost—ayes 10.

Another motion was made, that the Senate retire to their private chamber.

Lost—ayes 8.

MR. WRIGHT offered a motion, that the counsel in support of the petition of J. S. Pickering be not heard until the return of the managers, or until their intention be signified.

Lost—ayes 7.

MR. HARPER being then called on by the PRESIDENT to proceed within the rule, rose and addressed the Court as follows:

Under the permission of this honorable Court, and as the friend of the family of Judge Pickering, as the friend likewise of this honorable Court, if I may be allowed to claim so high a distinction, I beg leave to state the nature of those facts and proofs, on which the friends of Judge Pickering have thought fit to found the application they have made to this Court. As I despair being able to convey their sentiments in language more impressive, or more in unison with their wishes, than that which they have themselves used, I beg leave to begin with reading the petition of J. S. Pickering. It is in the following words:

[Here MR. HARPER read the foregoing petition.]

These allegations, resumed MR. HARPER, are, I apprehend, sufficient to insure the object sought for, provided they shall be substantiated by sufficient testimony, and such, as in questions of this kind, would be received in a common court of justice. This point this honorable Court will decide, after I shall have adduced the testimony I have to offer.

MR. HARPER then read the following depositions:

Deposition of Samuel Tenney.

I, Samuel Tenney, of the county of Rockingham and State of New Hampshire, one of the Representatives of said State in the Congress of the United States, testify and say:

That on the first day of October last, I called on John Pickering Esq., Judge of the district of New Hampshire, at lodgings provided for him by his friends in Greenland, (his family residing in Portsmouth,) for the purpose of ascertaining the real state of his mind by a personal interview, and found him with some laborers in a field at a small distance from the house, between the hours of four and five in the afternoon; that, when I addressed him, he appeared not to know me, asking me if I did not live in Dover: but, on my answering that I lived in Exeter, he recollected me, observing that I was a Representative in Congress; that, on my informing him I had done myself the pleasure to call and see him, he invited and accompanied me into the house, where he conversed with me on several unimportant topics long enough to satisfy me that he was perfectly sober. During which time he called a servant and ordered spirits, water, &c., to be placed on the table by which we were sitting; that the servant took a bottle of rum out of a closet belonging to the room, which closet was secured only by a button; that the said Judge turned out and diluted about a table-spoonfull, part of which he drank, apparently out of attention to me, and set down his tumbler; that his conversation was at first rational and pertinent, but on my mentioning the conflagration in Portsmouth last Winter, by which nearly all the property he possessed was destroyed, he instantly became wild, extravagant, and incoherent, asserting various things concerning the value of the estate he had lost and what he still possessed, which I have abundant reason to believe were not true; and exhibiting demonstrative evidence of a mind quoad hoc, altogether deranged; and this, so far as my knowledge extends, is the decided opinion of all who are acquainted with his present state.

I further testify that the said John Pickering has successively filled most of the important offices in the State, the duties of which, so far as a constitution extremely disposing him to nervous and hypochondriac complaints would permit, he ever discharged with honor to himself and to the public approbation, so long as Heaven saw fit to continue to him the exercise of the talents with which it had endowed him; that through this long and useful period of his life, he supported a character so singularly pure, amiable, and estimable, that the late irregularities in his conduct, which his friends confess and deplore, might alone be charitably deemed sufficient to demonstrate his insanity.

I testify, finally, that, from the emaciated and debilitated appearance of the said John Pickering, I have full reason to believe him altogether incapable, at this season of the year, of supporting the fatigues of a journey to this city, to attend his trial.

Deposition of A. R. Cutter.

I, Ammi R. Cutter of Portsmouth, in the county of Rockingham and State of New Hampshire, physician, depose and say: That I have been frequently called on as a physician to visit John Pickering, Esq., Judge of the district court of this district, before his appointment to that office, and since; that he has been, during all that time, very subject to nervous and hypochondriac complaints, which, in his own mind, often rendered him incapable of transacting business; that from my first visiting him he has never been free from such complaints, until his mental derangement took place. That, for several years past, Judge Pickering has been subject to great pain and debility of body from a rupture, which at times has confined him to his chamber, and always has such an effect as to prevent his walking as heretofore; that I have been particularly acquainted with Judge Pickering for many years, and have never known him to be in the habit of intemperance, intoxication, or of using profane language, excepting in some instances only, since his derangement of mind took place; that, on the contrary, his morals have always been remarkably correct and exemplary, both while at the bar and on the bench as chief justice of this State, and a district judge.

And I further depose, that such is the situation of Judge Pickering that he cannot, in my opinion, proceed on a journey to the City of Washington, at this time, without imminent hazard of his life.

AMMI R. CUTTER.

PORTSMOUTH, Feb. 11, 1804.

Deposition of J. Brackett.

I, Joshua Brackett of Portsmouth, in the district of New Hampshire, physician, depose and say: That about six years past I began the study of physic under Dr. Joshua Brackett, late of said Portsmouth, deceased, family physician and long and intimate acquaintance of John Pickering, Esq., district Judge of this State; that then and there I became acquainted with the Judge; that he was then very hypochondriacal, and subject to nervous complaints, but, as far as my knowledge extended, very exemplary and correct in his morals until within about three years, when he discovered symptoms of mental insanity, and consequent intemperance and profanity in some instances. That I have since visited the Judge as a physician for the last two years, and have found him laboring under mental insanity during said time, and think his mental insanity at this time to be in about the same degree as when I first visited him.

I further depose, that, from the history of Judge Pickering's character from his youth, given by his contemporaries, and particularly by the late Doctor Brackett, it appears that he was very subject to hypochondriacal complaints, but very exemplary and correct in his morals.

J. BRACKETT.

PORTSMOUTH, Feb. 14, 1804.

Mr. HARPER then read the following deposition of William Cutter:

I, William Cutter of Portsmouth, in the county of Rockingham and State of New Hampshire, physician, depose: That I have often and lately been in company with John Pickering, Esq., district Judge of this State, and that he cannot, from his bodily infirmities, proceed on a journey to the City of Washington at this time without, in my opinion, greatly endangering his life.

W. CUTTER.

PORTSMOUTH, Feb. 11, 1804.

The PRESIDENT observed that, as the order of the Senate was confined to the single allegation of insanity, this deposition could not be received.

Mr. HARPER remarked that, under an act of Congress of 1801, provision was made, that in case a Judge in any district court of the United States should be unable to perform the duties of his office, the circuit court for such district might appoint one of its members to perform the duties of such Judge. This case was provided for under the term "inability," without stating the kind of inability. He would therefore read the record of the circuit court on this point.

Mr. H. accordingly read the record, with the subjoined deposition of William Plumer, as follows:

To the honorable Judges of the circuit court of the United States for the first circuit now sitting at Portsmouth within and for the district of New Hampshire, this 25th day of April, Anno Domini 1801:

Humbly sheweth the subscriber, that the district Judge of the district court for said district, through indisposition and mental derangement, is at this time incapable of performing the duties of his office. Whereupon, he suggests to this honorable court the necessity of directing one of the circuit judges of said court to perform the duties of the said district Judge within and for said district, during the period the inability of said district Judge shall continue.

JAMES SHEAFE.

JOHN STEELE, Clerk.

Copy examined by

*Trial of Judge Pickering.DISTRICT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, SS.

At a circuit court of the United States for the first circuit, begun and held at Portsmouth in said district of New Hampshire, on the 23d day of April, 1801.

Present—The honorable John Lowell, Chief Judge; the honorable Benjamin Bourne and the honorable Jeremiah Smith, Esqs., circuit Judges.

It having been represented to this court that the district Judge of this district is unable to perform the duties of his office, and satisfactory evidence of the inability of said district Judge being shown to the circuit court, it is thereupon directed by the court, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by the 25th section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, that Jeremiah Smith, Esq., one of the judges of this court, perform the duties of the said district Judge during the period the inability of the said district Judge shall continue.

A true copy of the record.

Attest: JOHN STEELE, Clerk.

I, William Plumer, of lawful age, do testify that I was present at said court when the foregoing application was made. That testimony was given to prove the insanity of the said Pickering; that, during the week in which that court was in session, I saw the said Pickering several times in company with said Judges at their lodgings and at other places; and that I heard each of them, to wit, Lowell, Bourne, and Smith, say, that from their own view, as well as from testimony, they were fully satisfied that Judge Pickering was in a state of insanity, and on that ground they had made the order aforesaid. W. PLUMER.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1804.

Mr. HARPER then commenced the reading of the deposition of Edward St. Loe Livermore. During the reading, particularly of that part wherein the deponent states his opinion that the insanity of Judge Pickering did not arise from his intemperance, but the latter from the former, Mr. H. was interrupted by the President, who desired him to read only that part which related to the allegation of insanity. In compliance with this injunction Mr. H. waived reading a considerable portion of the affidavit. Notwithstanding, however, this circumstance, we give it entire; remarking that only that part of it relative to the allegation of insanity was received as evidence.

Deposition of Edward St. Loe Livermore.

I, Edward St. Loe Livermore, depose and say, that in the beginning of November in the year 1802, I was applied to by Eliphalet Ladd, Esq. of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, to attend a special district court to be holden at Portsmouth on the eleventh of said November, to exhibit a claim for a certain ship called the Eliza, and two cables, seized by the officers of the customs and libelled in said court. The statement of the case made to me by the said Ladd, was this: that in the month of September, 1802, the ship Eliza, owned by him and of which his son was master, arrived at Boston with a cargo of salt, and nothing else, except some pieces of check linen which were the private adventure of the captain. That the ship was entered at Boston and the duties on the salt secured, and the duty upon the linen paid by the captain, and the vessel authorized to proceed to Portsmouth to discharge her cargo; accordingly she arrived at Portsmouth, where the captain obtained a permit from the collector for landing the linens and also a permit was given for landing the salt. That while the ship was at some foreign place (I think Bonavista) her cables, which were old, became much chafed, and injured, at some bad anchorage ground; and that a vessel of which a certain Captain Lamb was master, being cast away, the seamen from the Eliza were employed in saving goods from the wreck, and Capt. Lamb to compensate them gave them a new cable which had been saved. This cable had been purchased by Capt. Lamb intending it for sale in the Southern States, but it was a very ordinary one, made of very bad materials. That Capt. Ladd thinking the situation of his ship to be such as to require a new cable, purchased it of his crew for his ship's use; and it was accordingly bent to his best anchor on the passage home; and that with old and new the ship was but indifferently found. That while the ship was discharging her cargo of salt at Portsmouth, the cables (being in the way) were taken out of the ship, and put into a store upon the wharf; and that the vessel, after discharging, was intended to be hove down for the purpose of graving; that it always had been customary to take out the cables, as well as the ship's sails, upon such occasions, and that the same had now been done in the presence of some of the custom-house officers; and no question had ever been made as to the legality of such doings. From this statement (which was afterwards fully proved on the trial) I was of opinion that the revenue of the United States had not been in danger of suffering material injury and accordingly engaged with Mr. Ladd to undertake his defence. The cables he informed me had been appraised by two merchants and a ropemaker (all as respectable as any in the town of Portsmouth) at two hundred and fifty dollars value; and by an order from the district judge had been delivered to him, but had again been immediately seized by the officers, alleging that the judge was incompetent and the proceedings had been irregular. I informed Colonel Ladd that the trial must be truly farcical as the judge was insane and wholly incapable of transacting business; and as there could be no appeal in the case of the cables, it was but the cast of a die whether he lost them or not. It was at that time considered by me to be an unfortunate circumstance that the cables were valued so low; but the reason, he informed me, was, that the ropemaker, who well understood the value of such articles, said the new cable was made of so bad materials, and the others so old and rotten they were worth very little. But with respect to the ship he could appeal if the insane judge decreed against him—and even if it were possible to conceive that the cables were illegally landed, yet as the value did not amount to four hundred dollars, and the affair of the linens appearing to be merely a mistake at the custom-house, the ship could not be condemned. Accordingly I attended at the time and place; soon after the judge arrived and appeared to me very feeble in body and greatly deranged in mind. By his singular appearance and extravagant incoherent language he drew a large concourse of people into the court-house, and behaved in so wild and disordered a manner, as to afford mirth to the giddy multitude, but the most painful sensations to all those who knew his excellent character and had judgment enough to reflect on the deplorable situation of a man when deprived of his reason. He seemed to have some recollection of the business before him, and ordered the parties to proceed; saying that he had heard enough of the libels (using very profane language) and would decide upon them in a few minutes. But such was the situation of the judge, and the general confusion, that I suggested to the district attorney the propriety of postponing the business until the ensuing day. Mr. Sherburne acquiesced. I accordingly moved for the postponement, upon which the judge demanded the reason. I informed him I wished for time to prepare my claims—he immediately answered in his former benevolent style “my dear, I will give you to all eternity;” and immediately ordered the court adjourned to nine o’clock the next day, observing that he would “then be sober.” I do not recollect that he said “I am damned drunk now,” and am strongly inclined to believe he did not utter those words, and think I should have recollected them if he had uttered them, as the other expressions made a deep impression on my mind, and very much surprised me, and induced me to believe, as I apprehend it did many others, that the judge was intoxicated. At the hour appointed the next day, he attended, and his appearance was not different from the preceding day, and was equally as irrational. I then concluded it would be best to get through the farcical trial as soon as possible, wholly uncertain of the event; but was informed that the judge, before he reached the court-house, had declared he was determined to condemn both ship and cargo, and had expressed himself with great disapprobation of the claimant, Col. Ladd. The trial of the libel against the cables being the first in order, I immediately proceeded to the examination of the witnesses for the claimant, who testified very circumstantially to the facts in the statement which I have before mentioned. During the testimony of the witnesses the judge appeared attentive, but I do not apprehend he understood much of their testimony. Possibly he might, but he pretty soon declared that both vessel and cargo should be restored to the claimant, and ordered the clerk to enter the decree. Mr. Sherburne then observed to him he had heard only one side, and that he wished to produce his witnesses in behalf of the United States. The Judge replied he might produce forty thousand, but it would not alter the decree. Mr. Sherburne then claimed an appeal to the Circuit Court; upon which the Judge said he might appeal, but he would take care that the decree should not be altered. I objected to an appeal, as the matter in controversy, the cables, did not amount to three hundred dollars in value. The Judge then said there should be no appeal. I intimated to Mr. Sherburne that it must be the court ad quem not a quo that should determine the right of appeal, and if he was dissatisfied with the determination of the distracted judge, he could apply to the Circuit Court—but he persisted in demanding an appeal, and the Judge refused, telling him that he knew that he had talked the matter over with him in his office five hundred times. This was answered with warmth, by an absolute contradiction by Mr. Sherburne; and the Judge as positively persisted in the assertion, which produced a scene of confusion. I told Mr. Sherburne that he ought not to let the assertion of a distracted man disturb him, to which he assented; and I thought that Mr. Sherburne entertained no doubt of the judge’s distraction. At length the court was adjourned, to the great relief of all the thinking part of the audience.

I do not recollect any demand of an appeal being made in the case of the ship, and am confident that had there been I should have recollected it, as the same objection as to value could not have been made, but I have ever since presumed that the prosecutor was satisfied that there were no linens illegally imported, and that the value of the cables could not amount to four hundred dollars—and even if they were illegally landed, it would not subject the vessel to condemnation: and this was the cause that no application was ever made to the circuit court upon the subject.

It is impossible for me to repeat all the incoherent jargon uttered by Judge Pickering at this time, and the talk would be very painful should I repeat it. But during the whole of the transaction I entertained but one opinion on the subject, relative to the cause of the judge’s irregularities of this day, which was merely, that it was distraction. I am sensible some gentlemen entertained a different opinion, and among those was the Marshal of the district. But as I well knew that from his situation in life, he had not had the opportunity of knowing the judge as well as myself, I endeavored to convince him his distraction was not occasioned by too free a use of liquor of any kind; and I am fully of the opinion that he was not intoxicated with any kind of spirituous liquor on this day.

It is now more than twenty years since I have had a most intimate acquaintance with Judge Pickering; our avocations being the same, of course led to it, and always until his distraction he has sustained a most excellent moral character, and I never knew a man more perfectly free from the imputation of any vice or immorality than Judge Pickering. But he was not merely negatively good; his active virtues were always considered of the most amiable kind. He was very chaste in his conversation, and in no instance, that I can recollect, did he use profane, obscene, or indelicate language; and a person of much discernment, formerly acquainted with him, and hearing his conversation at this time, I think would be convinced of his distraction, were there no other proof. I am sensible that it has been reported that Judge Pickering injured himself by the too free use of inebriating liquors; and it has been the opinion of some not so well acquainted with him, this was the principal cause of his distraction. I think it was very erroneous and the supposition uncharitable. It is possible at times he may have drank too freely, but I think I have good reason to conclude it was the consequence of his insanity, as it is easy to imagine that a man in this situation would be intemperate. For many years I have known him to have been grievously afflicted with nervous disorders, to which all studious and sedentary men are in some degree liable; but frequently I have seen him so extremely affected, that to appearance his distress and sufferings have been as great as the human frame could endure—and I can distinctly recollect instances from June seventeen hundred and ninety to eighteen hundred, the time in which his distraction became very apparent, that his disorder has rendered him unfit for public business; and, being Chief Justice of the Supreme Court several years, much disappointment and confusion was occasioned by his frequent illness, and his situation was the subject of much conversation. This disorder showed itself in different ways, sometimes in acute pains, at others in hypochondriac affections; he grew excessively fearful of crossing ferries, and frequently was very wild in his imagination; and such were his conceits (as they were called by some) and fearful apprehensions of—he could not tell what—that some of his most intimate friends pronounced him to be approaching to a state of insanity, or total incapacity for business; but in all this time, there was not the least suggestion or surmise that a fondness for drink was the cause, although, perhaps no man in New Hampshire was at the time more conversed about. One instance in particular I will mention, of the business of the court being thrown into confusion on account of his illness. In the fall of the year seventeen hundred and ninety-four, it was necessary that he should go the circuit; as there were but three judges of the Superior Court at that time, and the whole were necessary to constitute a quorum. The judge was so ill, that he declared it was impossible for him to reach Amherst, which is little short of sixty miles from Portsmouth, his place of residence. With much difficulty and great entreaties, he was prevailed upon to make the attempt, but consented, provided I would ride with him in a chaise, and carry him a roundabout way in order to avoid a ferry, and pass the river Merrimack, upon a bridge newly erected, and (as he said) take care of him. We travelled part of the way the first day, but his distress and sufferings were so great that I am confident he slept none through the night, as he wholly prevented my sleeping. The next morning he expressed his determination of returning, but with much persuasion I induced him to proceed to Amherst, where the first court was to be holden; and the day following he came into the court, and sat while a cause was partly tried: but finding he could sit no longer, the court was adjourned, and he went to his lodgings, where he was confined by sickness about a fortnight; he then returned to Portsmouth, and thus ended the Fall circuit of 1794. Many unfeeling people at this time, affected to say, that his disorder was feigned or imaginary—in the same manner that some do now, that his distraction is the effect of drink.

In the beginning of the year 1800, I heard it intimated that Judge Pickering was deranged in his mind—that his extravagant actions and conversation could be accounted for upon no other principle. But the first proof I recollect to have received, was in the summer of that year, when he called at my house before sun-rise one morning, and insisted on seeing me, having business of great importance: when I came to him to know the cause of so early a visit, he informed me that he was immediately going to set out for Philadelphia in a coach and six, to see the President, and should be back in five days. I instantly perceived his situation, and my conversation with him was in conformity. I told him there were many obstacles in his way, such as bad ferries. He answered, he had got above all those considerations since his voyage to England. I inquired of him when he had been in England; well knowing that a ferry was the utmost extent of his navigation. He said he had been in England, France, and Germany, and various other countries across the Atlantic; and then mentioned his having been a captain of horse in the British army—told me the particular uniform he used to wear—that he was sent at a particular time by Government as ambassador to make peace with the Indians, interlarding his stories with oaths, and the most incoherent language imaginable, that left not a doubt upon my mind of his distraction. I mentioned this affair to gentlemen, and found he had told the same stories before. I saw no more of him for some time, as he was removed into the country by his friends on account of his insanity; and I thought it was perfectly understood by all persons who knew him that he was distracted; and many anecdotes respecting him have been related as proofs of his derangement; and one in particular has been deemed an unequivocal proof, that is, his undertaking to dismiss Jonathan Steele, Esq., from his office of clerk of the district court, and of appointing R. Cutts Shannon, Esq., as Mr. Steele had given universal satisfaction in the office, and there was no cause for his removal. Mr. Steele, upon the application of Mr. Shannon, refused to give up the records; and the relatives of the judge have so managed the business that Mr. Steele has continued in the office ever since. I thought that both Mr. Steele and Mr. Shannon were convinced of his distraction, and have several times conversed with them upon the subject.

The Judge continued to grow worse, and, after the passing of the late judiciary act—now repealed—Judge Smith was appointed to do the duties of the office, and New Hampshire was relieved from the embarrassment until the repeal of the act, since which time several distressing scenes have passed, in consequence of the duties again devolving upon the unfortunate Judge.

E. ST. LOE LIVERMORE.

Portsmouth, N. H., Feb. 15, 1804.

Then Edward St. Loe Livermore, Esq., made oath that the foregoing affidavit by him subscribed, was just and true, according to the best of his knowledge.

Attest: GEO. SULLIVAN, J. P.

Mr. HARPER said this was the testimony on which he founded the application, which was to postpone the trial until such time as the Court may think fit, in order to take depositions.

The PRESIDENT.—It does not seem to me proper to receive any motion from you. The Senate will attend to what you have said, and take proper order upon it.

Mr. HARPER said he was but little solicitous about form; he regarded substance. His only wish was that an opportunity should be allowed, and the necessary facilities afforded to obtain testimony. This being his object, it was not his wish to occupy the time of the Court unnecessarily. The testimony he had just submitted was of itself amply sufficient, upon which to rest, with this honorable Court, the prayer of the petitioner, and to ground the application he had intended to make. It was such as carried conviction with it, and required no observations of his to apply or elucidate it. Most of the gentlemen whose affidavits he had read, and their respectability of character, must be well known to members of the Court; and he humbly presumed that, after evidence so direct and conclusive, scarcely a doubt could possibly remain upon the mind of any gentleman as to the insanity of this most unfortunate man, as well at present, as at the time when the offences charged against him in the articles of impeachment were committed. And surely, Mr. President, said Mr. H., it cannot be necessary to produce authorities to prove to this Court that the mildness and humanity of our laws exempt the insane from prosecution and punishment. Surely it cannot be necessary to show to this Court that the man whom God has been pleased to bereave of the greatest of all earthly blessings, his reason, and who, without mind, is incapable of committing any crime, and not amenable to human laws for his conduct. Surely, sir, it cannot be necessary to show to this Court that to constitute any crime a vicious will is necessary, and that a man insane cannot be put upon his trial—cannot in a criminal prosecution be called upon to plead, either by himself or counsel, guilty or not guilty—being at the time without any rational will, and not knowing the meaning of such a plea; or of showing that such a person is utterly incapable even of receiving any legal notice to attend upon judicial proceedings. The principles, Mr. H. observed, were too well settled, and too well known to every member of this honorable Court to render such a proceeding on his part necessary. To their justice and to their wisdom he would, therefore, confidently appeal, and beg leave to submit the prayer of the petitioner in behalf of his most unfortunate parent.

The Court then adjourned until the next day.

A short time after the managers returned from the Court, Mr. NICHOLSON, in their behalf, made to the House of Representatives the following communication:

"That on Friday, the second of March, the managers, agreeably to the directions of the House, appeared at the bar of the Senate, to support the said articles of impeachment, when John Pickering was three times solemnly called, but did not answer, or appear, either in person, or by counsel. The President of the Senate then stated, that he had received a letter, signed R. G. Harper, accompanying a petition, signed Jacob S. Pickering, who called himself the son of the party charged. The petition being read, it was found to contain a statement of a variety of matter, particularly the insanity of Judge Pickering, upon which the prayer of the petition was founded for a postponement of the trial to some future day. Mr. Harper was called to the bar of the Senate; he entered, and stated, that he wished it to be distinctly understood, that he did not appear at the bar of the Senate as counsel for John Pickering, from whom he had received no authority for that purpose: but that his object was to support the facts contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. There was a short pause,—when Mr. Harper rose again, and inquired, whether his appearance in support of the petition would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering, by counsel. The President of the Senate answered, he presumed, that Mr. Harper's appearance would not be considered as the appearance of John Pickering by counsel.

"The managers, under these circumstances, felt themselves bound to object to Mr. Harper's being heard in any other capacity than as counsel for the party who was impeached; and briefly stated their reasons for the objection.

"The Senate withdrew to a private chamber, where it is presumed the question was debated. The managers again appeared at the bar of the Senate this day, and were informed by the President, that it had been resolved to hear Mr. Harper in support of the allegations contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. The managers inquired at what point of time it was intended that Mr. Harper should be heard, and whether this was to be a measure preliminary to the trial: The President of the Senate declared, that he could not undertake to explain the resolutions of the Senate; but that their sense must be collected from the resolutions themselves. The managers then offered themselves ready for trial, declaring that they were prepared to open the prosecution on behalf of the House of Representatives, and that the witnesses were ready to prove the facts charged in the articles of impeachment. Upon this offer being made, the President of the Senate stated that he considered it to be the sense of the Senate, that Mr. Harper was to be heard before the trial commenced.

"The managers considered this as an irregular step, and not believing that they ought to discuss any petition presented to the Senate from a person who was not a party to the impeachment, and this, too, before the party charged, although duly notified, had appeared, either in person, or by attorney, withdrew from the Senate Chamber. They will not feel themselves either bound or authorized to appear again, until the Senate shall inform them that they are prepared to proceed in the trial, unless specially directed by this House."

Mr. SMILIE, as soon as the above report was read, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House doth approve of the conduct of the managers appointed to support the articles of impeachment in the case of John Pickering, as stated in their report of this day, and that the said managers do not appear at the bar of the Senate, until they shall be specially instructed by this House.

Mr. ELLIOT moved to strike out the words "as stated in their report of this day."

Mr. ELMER remarked that the managers appeared to think the proceedings of the Senate incorrect. This might be the case; but from the information before him he was not prepared to say so. He was of opinion that the Senate were the sole judges of the mode of conducting trials before them.

Mr. SMILIE.—The Senate undoubtedly have the right of fixing their mode of procedure; but if that mode shall be such as to interfere with our rights, we have a right to insist upon them. Such a procedure, as has been adopted by the Senate, in the present instance, I have never heard of. But if the managers are satisfied with what has been already done, without any further act on the part of the House, I am also. It is my wish that they would inform us of what they desire.

Mr. DANA.—It is very proper for the managers of an impeachment to apply to the House on the occurrence of a new case; but it is not necessary for the House to express an opinion of their conduct in every stage of the trial. It may be proper to give them instructions when they desire it; but it is not necessary to pass a vote of approbation or disapprobation on their conduct. In this case it is entirely useless, and may be injurious. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The managers entertain no other desire but that of being guided in the discharge of the duty devolved upon them by the directions of the House. They would deem it a matter of extreme regret were the House to disapprove their conduct on the present occasion. But no individual among them—I speak for myself, and believe I may likewise speak for all those associated with me—wishes a vote of approbation by this House. I would, therefore, be pleased, if the gentleman would agree to strike out that part of the resolution which expresses such approbation. If the mover does not agree to this modification, I shall take the liberty of moving it.

Mr. SMILIE.—I cannot agree to strike out this part of the resolution, as it is, in my opinion, the most important feature in it. The conduct of the Senate has met with the disapprobation of the managers, and they have withdrawn, right or wrong. It is proper for the House to express an opinion, whether it is correct or incorrect.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that on further reflection he did not consider himself at liberty to make any motion, or to vote on any made on the subject before the House.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL was of opinion that it would only be necessary for the House to express an opinion in case they disapproved the conduct of the managers.

Mr. HUGER declared himself of the same opinion.

Mr. J. LEWIS moved a postponement of the further consideration of the motion until to-morrow.

Mr. SMILIE had no objection to the postponement.

All further procedure was arrested by the agreement to a motion of Mr. NICHOLSON to adjourn.

On the ensuing day, Mr. SMILIE said, as the resolution appeared to be disagreeable to some gentlemen, he would withdraw it. It was accordingly withdrawn.

WEDNESDAY, March 7.

On motion that the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Court of Impeachment is open and now ready to receive and hear the managers in support of the articles of impeachment exhibited by them against John Pickering, judge of the district of New Hampshire, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith of New York, John Smith of Ohio, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Ellery, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, and Tracy.

The Court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

THURSDAY, March 8.

About 12 o'clock the Court was opened, and the managers appeared before the Senate, when

Mr. EARLY, in their behalf, addressed the Court as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Representatives of the United States appear before this high Court, as suitors for remedial justice against John Pickering, district judge for the district of New Hampshire.

Among the various duties assigned to Congress by the Constitution, there is no description of superior importance; none, the discharge of which is equally painful with that now before them. The grand inquest of the nation have accused before this tribunal an officer whose functions are the most delicate—whose trust is the most sacred. They have charged him with acts highly derogatory to his character as a man; with transgressions disgraceful to him as a judge; with crimes ruinous to the interest and reputation of his Government: and the time has arrived, sir, when they are called upon to make good these charges.

The wisdom manifested in the organization of that admirable Constitution which forms the glory of this country, is in nothing more eminently conspicuous than in the mode of trial prescribed for high State offenders. While on the one hand it guards against the influence and intrigue of power and of patronage, it raises, on the other, a shield sufficiently formidable to resist the weight of the Representatives of the Union. To this grand depository of national justice are safely committed the dearest rights and interests of public officers, and the most sacred claims of the Government.

It is certainly true that the trial by impeachment has not unfrequently in another country, been made the engine of oppression. But it is equally true that there the influence of a Crown, armed with all the weapons of prerogative, has proved the most usual source of invasion upon individual rights. Not so with us. This judicature owes nothing to Executive patronage. The source of their appointment and responsibility is found elsewhere. It is situated where there is least danger of its operating upon their hopes or their fears in the discharge of their judicial functions.

But, sir, there is another guard pre-eminently distinguishing the wisdom of the American Government, and the sacred care with which its framers endeavored to fortify the rights of the accused. It is the peculiar privilege of the officers of this Government, that nothing short of the voice of two-thirds of their judges can produce their conviction.

The House of Representatives have not, Mr. President, resorted to the said expedient of impeaching, and demanding the trial of the defendant, without the most mature deliberation. They have not done it, sir, without a thorough conviction that the interests of their country and the solemn duty of their stations, imperiously required it at their hands: and they now proceed to make good their charges, under the fullest confidence that the decision will be governed by the immutable principles of justice, and redound to the honor of our common country.

Believing that the best course which can be pursued in this case, and that which will be most likely to simplify it, will be to take the articles offered by the House of Representatives, in succession, I will, in support of the allegations contained in each article adduce the proof, necessary to substantiate them.

The first article is in the following words:

"ARTICLE 1. That Whereas George Wentworth, Surveyor of the District of New Hampshire, did in the port of Portsmouth, in the said district, on waters that are navigable from the sea by vessels of more than ten tons burden, on the fifteenth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, seize the ship called the Eliza, about two hundred and eighty-five tons burden, whereof William Ladd was late master, together with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, alleging that there had been unladen from on board of said ship, contrary to law, sundry goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth and manufacture, of the value of four hundred dollars and upwards, and did likewise seize on land within the said district, on the 7th day of October, in the year 1802, two cables of the value of two hundred and fifty dollars; part of the said goods which were alleged to have been unladen from on board the said ship as aforesaid contrary to law; and whereas Thomas Chadbourn, a deputy marshal of the said district of New Hampshire, did, on the 16th day of October, in the year 1802, by virtue of an order of the said John Pickering, judge of the district court of the said district of New Hampshire, arrest and detain in custody for trial before the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, the said ship, called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and also the two cables aforesaid:

"And whereas by an act of Congress, passed on the second day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, it is among other things provided that 'upon the prayer of any claimant to the court that any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, so seized and prosecuted, or any part thereof, should be delivered to such claimant, it shall be lawful for the court to appoint three proper persons to appraise such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, who shall be sworn in open court, for the faithful discharge of their duty; and such appraisement shall be made at the expense of the party on whose prayer it is granted; and on the return of such appraisement, if the claimant shall, with one or more sureties to be approved of by the court, execute a bond in the usual form to the United States, for the payment of a sum equal to the sum of which the ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, so prayed to be delivered and appraised, and moreover produce a certificate from the collector of the district wherein such trial is had, and of the naval officer thereof, if any there be, that the duties on the goods, wares, and merchandise, or tonnage duty on the ship or vessel, so claimed, have been paid or secured in like manner, as if the goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, had been legally entered, the court shall, by rule, order such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, to be delivered to the said claimant;' yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court of the said district of New Hampshire, the said act of Congress not regarding, but with intent to evade the same, did order the said ship called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and the said two cables, to be delivered to a certain Eliphalet Ladd, who claimed the same, without his, the said Eliphalet Ladd, producing any certificate from the collector and naval officer of the said district that the tonnage duty on the said ship, or the duties on the said cables, had been paid or secured, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, against the law of the United States, and to the manifest injury of their revenue."

I will first read that part of the act of Congress that requires the certificate stated as necessary in the article which I have just read, and then adduce testimony to substantiate the facts set forth in it.

It will be observed, said Mr. E., that not only a bond, with one or more sureties, is required to be executed for the payment of the sum at which the vessels and goods shall be appraised, but that previous to the delivery of the vessel or goods a certificate must be produced from the proper officers that the duties on the goods and the tonnage duty have been secured. We have an explanation of the record in the case of the ship Eliza.

Mr. E. here read that part of the record bearing on the allegations set forth in the first article. To avoid the repetition of the several parts of the records, we subjoin the whole.

NEW HAMPSHIRE DISTRICT, ss.

At a special district court of the United States, begun and held at Portsmouth, within and for said district, on the eleventh day of November, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and two, by the Hon. John Pickering, judge of said court.

The United States of America, by John Whipple, collector of the said district, libel, propound and give the judge of said court to understand and be informed, that on the 15th day of October, 1802, George Wentworth, surveyor of said district of Portsmouth, did, in the port of Portsmouth, in said district, on waters that are navigable from the sea by vessels of more than ten tons burden, seize the ship called the Eliza, of about two hundred and eighty-five tons burden, whereof William Ladd was late master, together with all her tackle, apparel, and furniture, for the following causes, namely, that sundry goods and merchandise, viz: two cables, and one hundred pieces of checked linen, of the value of four hundred dollars and upwards, were unladen and delivered from said ship Eliza, in the district aforesaid, between the twentieth day of September last, and the thirtieth day of the same September, without a permit from the collector and naval officer, or any other person authorized to give the same. And the said Joseph Whipple doth aver, that the said two cables and said linen are of foreign growth and manufacture, and subject by law to the payment of duties on importation into the United States; and that said cables and linen were brought into said district of Portsmouth in said ship Eliza from some foreign port or place, and that the duties to which said cables and linen were subject on importation, have not been paid or secured to be paid, and that said cables and linen were unladen, delivered, and landed from said ship Eliza in said district without a permit therefor from the collector and naval officer, and contrary to law; and the said Joseph Whipple doth further aver, that said cables and linen at the time of discharging, unloading, and delivering thereof as aforesaid, were, and ever since have been, and now are, of the value of four hundred dollars and upwards, and that said cables were seized on land in said district of Portsmouth, and are duly libelled in this honorable court. Wherefore, the said Joseph Whipple, collector as aforesaid, in the name and behalf of the United States of America, prays the advisement of this court in the premises, and that said ship Eliza, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, may be adjudged to be and remain forfeited and disposed of according to law. Due notice having been given of the seizure aforesaid, and of this trial thereon, Eliphalet Ladd, by Edward St. Loe Livermore, Esq., his proctor and attorney, now comes into court and claims the said ship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and shows to this honorable court that he is owner of said ship and appurtenances, and that at the time mentioned in said libel, or at any other time, there was not unladen from on board said ship any goods, wares, and merchandise, of the value of four hundred dollars, or of any other value, contrary to law, and that said ship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, are not by law forfeited in manner and form as by said libellant is set forth in said libel; and he thereupon prays the advisement of this honorable court, and that the same may be decreed to be restored to him. And on hearing the said parties, it is ordered and decreed by the court, that the said ship Eliza, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd the claimant, from which decree an appeal to the next circuit court for said district is claimed and refused by the court.

NEW HAMPSHIRE DISTRICT, ss.

At a special district court of the United States, begun and held at Portsmouth, within and for said district, on the eleventh day of November, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and two, by the Hon. John Pickering, judge of said court:

The United States of America, by Joseph Whipple, collector of said district, libel, propound and give the judge of said court to understand and be informed, that George Wentworth, surveyor of said district of Portsmouth, did, on the seventh day of October, one thousand eight hundred and two, on land, within said district, seize and secure sundry goods and merchandise, viz: two cables, which were imported into said United States contrary to law. And the said Joseph Whipple, collector as aforesaid, further propounds, shows, and informs, that the said cables are of foreign growth and manufacture, and subject by law to the payment of duties on importation into the United States, and that said duties have not been paid nor secured to be paid; and that said cables were brought into said district in a certain ship called the Eliza, whereof William Ladd was then master, and unladen and delivered thereupon between the twentieth day of September last and the thirtieth day of the same September, within said district, without a permit from the collector and naval officer for such unloading and delivery. Wherefore the said Joseph Whipple prays the advisement of this court in the premises in the behalf of the United States and of all persons interested in said seizure, and that said cables may be decreed to be and remain forfeited and be disposed of according to law. Due notice having been given of the seizure aforesaid and of this trial, Eliphalet Ladd, by Edward St. Loe Livermore, Esq., his attorney and proctor, now comes into court and claims the said cables as part of the tackle and appurtenances of a certain ship called the Eliza, whereof he is the owner, and says that said cables, at the time of said seizure, as mentioned in said libel, were appurtenant, and belonging to said ship as her cables; and that before that time, according to usage and custom, and for the necessary repairs of said ship, and for the purpose of again fitting her for sea, had been taken out said ship, and for no other purpose whatever; and that said cables were not illegally imported into the United States, neither were the same at any time subject to the payment of duties, agreeably to the true intent and meaning of the laws of the United States, and that the same are not by law forfeited as said libellant has set forth; he thereupon prays that said cables may be decreed to be restored to him. On hearing the said parties, it is ordered and decreed by the court that the cables aforesaid be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant; from which decree an appeal to the next circuit court for said district is claimed and refused by the court.

A true copy of record with the seal of said court annexed.

Attest: J. STEELE, Clerk.

Joseph Whipple, Collector of Portsmouth, was then sworn:

He testified that no duties had been secured on the two cables seized; that on intimation being made that they were landed, they were seized, and as they exceeded four hundred dollars in value, the ship Eliza was also seized. He had understood that one of the cables was taken from the wreck of a vessel cast away, and that it had been bent for the purpose of evading the duty. On inquiry the cost of the two cables was found to be $520. One cable appeared not to have been used. On being asked the value of that cable, he said he could not recollect what it was.

[Mr. EARLY here read the record of the court in the case of the libel against the cables, as above.]

Mr. EARLY.—Having thus made good the facts and allegations contained in the first article, I will proceed to the second, which represents:

“ART. 2. That whereas, at a special district court of the United States, begun and held at Portsmouth, on the 11th day of November, in the year 1802, by John Pickering, judge of said court, the United States, by Joseph Whipple, the collector of said district, having libelled, propounded and given the said Judge to understand and be informed, that the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, had been seized as aforesaid, because there had been unladen therefrom, contrary to law, two cables and one hundred pieces of check, of the value of four hundred dollars, and having prayed in their said libel that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might by the said court be adjudged to be forfeited to the United States, and be disposed of according to law; and a certain Eliphalet Ladd, by his proctor and attorney, having come into the said court, and having claimed the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, and having denied that the said two cables and the said one hundred pieces of check had been unladen from the said ship contrary to law, and having prayed the said court that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might be restored to him, the said Eliphalet Ladd, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, did proceed to the hearing and trial of the said cause thus pending between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited by law, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right; and whereas John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States, in and for the said district of New Hampshire, did appear in the said district, as his special duty it was by law, to prosecute the said cause in behalf of the United States, and did produce sundry witnesses to prove the facts charged by the United States in the libel filed by the collector as aforesaid in the said court, and to show that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, was justly forfeited to the United States, and did pray the said court that the said witnesses might be sworn in behalf of the United States, yet the said John Pickering, being then judge of the said district court, and then in court sitting, with intent to defeat the just claims of the United States did refuse to hear the testimony of the said witnesses so as aforesaid, produced in behalf of the United States, and without hearing the said testimony so adduced in behalf of the United States in the trial of the said cause, did order and decree the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, to be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, in violation of the laws of the United States, and to the manifest injury of the revenue."

Mr. EARLY.—The record of the court applicable to this article, is as follows. [Mr. E. here quoted the record.] This record states that the ship Eliza was ordered to be restored by Judge Pickering, and an appeal refused.

Jonathan Steele, Clerk of the Court, sworn:

The deponent said he was present at the trial, and that witnesses were offered on the part of the Government to make good the charges stated in the libel. The court decided that they should not be examined; afterwards allowed their examination, and then refused to hear a word, and directed an adjournment; after ordering a restoration of the vessel to the claimants, and refusing an appeal. All the proceedings were had on the second day, when several witnesses, though he believed not all on the part of the United States, were sworn. No distinct reason was assigned for refusing to examine the witnesses. He believes the counsel for the claimant did assign some reasons, but he does not recollect them. The attorney of the district attempted to reply, but was stopped. The Judge said he had decreed the restoration of the ship and cables, and would not hear him.

John S. Sherburne, District Attorney, was sworn.

He stated that, in support of the libel, he exhibited the manifest received from the Collector of Boston, where the ship landed a part of her cargo. He offered this as evidence that the cables were a part of the cargo, they being so stated in the manifest to the Collector of Boston. He offered some witnesses to show, that by the captain's own declaration, they had been considered as merchandise. The Judge immediately interrupted him, and said he had decreed the restoration of the ship and cables. The deponent is not certain whether the counsel for the claimant did or did not object to his making the observations he was about to do to the court. The business was pressed; the Judge then said the deponent might examine the witnesses. On proceeding to examine them, the Judge interrupted the deponent, and adjourned the court. The deponent does not recollect that the Judge assigned any reasons for refusing to hear testimony. He declared, on opening the business, that he would spend very little time in attending to it—adding that he could finish the business in four minutes. He decreed the restoration without hearing any witnesses whose testimony was material. Some testimony was adduced as to the value of the cables. The deponent expected that his witnesses would prove that one of the cables was purchased by the captain of the Eliza for sale and not for use; and that the captain had said, on approaching land, that the cable should not be bent but to deceive the officers of the customs.

PRESIDENT.—Did you state to the court that testimony?

Mr. Sherburne.—I did not.

Mr. EARLY.—Are there any witnesses present that you intend to bring forward on the trial?

Mr. Sherburne.—I believe not. They were the crew of the vessel.

Mr. EARLY.—I will now proceed to make good the facts and allegations contained in the third article, which is as follows:

"ART. III. That whereas it is provided by an act of Congress, passed on the 24th day of September, in the year 1789, "that from all final decrees of the district court in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of three hundred dollars exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next circuit court to be held in such district;" and whereas on the 12th day of November in the year 1802, at the trial of the aforesaid cause between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited for the cause aforesaid, and the said Eliphalet Ladd, on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza with her furniture, tackle and apparel, in his own proper right, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district of New Hampshire, did decree that the said ship Eliza with her tackle, furniture and apparel, should be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd the claimant; and whereas the said John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States in and for the said district of New Hampshire, and prosecuting the said cause for and on the part of the United States, on the said 12th day of November in the year 1802, did, in the name and behalf of the United States, claim an appeal from said decree of the district court, to the next circuit court to be held in the said district of New Hampshire, and did pray the said district court to allow the said appeal, in conformity to the provisions of the act of Congress last aforesaid, yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, disregarding the authority of the laws, and wickedly meaning and intending to injure the revenues of the United States and thereby to impair their public credit, did absolutely and positively refuse to allow the said appeal, as prayed for and claimed by the said John S. Sherburne, in behalf of the United States, contrary to his trust and duty of judge of the district court, against the laws of the United States, to the great injury of the public revenue, and in violation of the solemn oath which he had taken to administer equal and impartial justice."

Mr. EARLY here read the act of Congress referred to.

Mr. EARLY.—The following record establishes beyond doubt the truth of the fact contained in this article.

[Mr. E. here read that part of the record relating to the allegations in the third article.]

Mr. EARLY.—In addition to this testimony, I will call on Mr. Sherburne again to relate the circumstances attending the refusal to allow the appeal.

Mr. Sherburne was again examined:

On the Judge declaring that he decreed a restoration of the vessel and cables, the deponent, after several efforts to obtain a hearing of the witnesses, required the allowance of an appeal, one in relation to the cables, and the other in relation to the ship. The Judge at first assented to the appeal, and, after using some profane language, observed that the decree should not be altered. The counsel for the claimant remarked that the cables were not valued at a sum that entitled the libellant to appeal from the decision of the district court. The deponent understood the appraisement of the ships and cables to have been made at the house of the Judge, and that the cables had been there valued at less than three hundred dollars. The deponent said he considered the whole of that proceeding a nullity, as the Judge had not a right to restore the vessel until the duties were secured or paid.

Mr. EARLY.—The testimony now required, relates to the refusal of an appeal in regard to the vessel.

Mr. Sherburne.—The whole was a scene of confusion. The deponent does not recollect any distinct observations made in relation to the ship. He claimed an appeal on both decrees; whereupon the counsel of the claimant observed that the valuation of the cables did not entitle the libellant to an appeal. The Judge did refuse an appeal on both decrees.

Mr. EARLY here stated that the ship was valued at three thousand five hundred dollars; and then proceeded to the fourth article, which is as follows:

“ART. 4. That whereas for the due, faithful, and impartial administration of justice, temperance and sobriety are essential qualities in the character of a judge; yet the said John Pickering, being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits, on the 11th and 12th days of November, in the year 1802, being then judge of the district court, in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear on the bench of the said court, for the administration of justice, in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of intoxicating liquors; and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all the good citizens of the United States; and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors, disgraceful to his own character as a judge, and degrading to the honor of the United States.

“And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said John Pickering; and also of replying to his or any answers which he shall make to the said articles, or any of them; and of offering proof to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said John Pickering may be put to answer the said high crimes and misdemeanors; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as may be agreeable to law and justice.”

Thomas Chadbourne, Deputy Marshal of New Hampshire, sworn.

He said he was present at the trial of the libel. On the first day nothing was done. On the second day the proceedings commenced. It was a hurly-burly business. The Judge refused hearing anything about the ship, and when an appeal was requested, ordered the court to be adjourned; and the court was adjourned. He saw the Judge on the morning of the second day, who was in a situation that disqualified him from discharging the duties of his office. The marshal required the deponent to go with him to the Judge's house, but he refused.

The deponent being asked, what was the situation of the Judge when he came into court? replied, that all was disorder and confusion; the Judge appeared to be in a state of intoxication. The attorney of the United States said, the revenue would be injured by such proceedings. The Judge damned the revenue, and said that he got but a thousand dollars of it, and cared nothing about it. He desired a number of gentlemen to come on the bench and sit along side of him. Some refused. He called me up, said Mr. Chadbourne. I went up, and sat along side of him. He talked to me in a most strange way. He called on a perfect stranger to sit aside of him. When I went up, he said, now damn him, we will fight him. I do not know what he meant. He said to a person within the bar, if you do not come up, I will come down and cane you. I believe he said the same thing to the marshal. I sat on one side of the Judge, and another person on his other side. When, on the first day, after holding his head down awhile, he ordered me to adjourn the court; he said, “I'm damn'd drunk, but I'll be sober by the morning.”

Question. Did the Judge exhibit all the usual marks of intoxication?

Answer. He did.

Question. Did you smell his breath?

Answer. No. I wanted nothing to convince me of his intoxication.

Question. Was he intoxicated at his own house on the first day?

Answer. Yes. He appeared so to me. He said, with some profane language, he had heard enough about the damned ship; and he did not mean to hear any more about her.

Question. What language did he use when the district attorney spoke of filing a bill of exceptions?

Answer. He said he would then sit along with an old wig. I did not, at first, know what he meant, but understood afterward that he meant a judge of the circuit court.

Question. Is Judge Pickering habitually addicted to intoxication?

Answer. For ten years past he has appeared to me to have been given to the habit of intoxication. He has appeared to me to exhibit all the symptoms of growing intoxication.

Question. How long have you known him?

Answer. For forty years.

Question. Had his face the usual marks of intoxication?

Answer. A good deal so—divers times before the trial I have seen him intoxicated in the streets.

Question. Have you ever seen him reel like a drunken man?

Answer. I have seen him go out sober in the morning, and return intoxicated at noon.

Jonathan Steele examined.

I was present at the trial in the district court, and remarked when the Judge entered the court that he was intoxicated. He with great difficulty got in. He exhibited every mark of intoxication; staggered and reeled, spoke in a thick way, scarcely articulating his words so as to be understood by me, though I was directly under him. He ordered the crier to open the court, and the gentleman to proceed with the trial, without having the libel read. He said he had heard of the damned libel. The gentleman hesitated; the Judge called on a number of the officers to come up on the bench; some refused, and others went up. To one person that refused, he said he would come down and give him a caning. No business was done, and the court adjourned.

The next morning the Judge came into court in the same situation, as much intoxicated as on the preceding day. He pursued the same system. Before the libel was read the counsel of the claimant was heard. The Attorney of the District then made a few observations, and called his witnesses. The Judge said their examination was inadmissible; abruptly stopped the trial; decreed the restoration of the ship and cables, and ordered the court to be adjourned. The Judge was outrageous, and used many profane expressions, frequently invoking the name of the Supreme Being. The Attorney of the District said he claimed an appeal. The Judge replied, appeal and be damned. The claimant's counsel objected to the appeal, on the ground that the valuation of the cables did not amount to three hundred dollars. The Judge said there should be no appeal. The District Attorney asked leave to file a bill of exceptions. The Judge refused, and adjourned the court.

On being interrogated, the deponent said it was the general opinion of the bystanders—of everybody present, that the Judge was drunk. The court was crowded, and this was the language in the mouth of everybody.

Question. When did you first hear of, or perceive the intoxication of Judge Pickering?

Answer. The first I ever knew of his intoxication, except on hearsay, was in May, 1799, at court. On that occasion he took three days to do some business that might have been done in half the number of hours. In November, 1799, I went into a barber's shop, where I found Judge Pickering, who could with great difficulty be kept in a chair. He staggered, when he went out of the shop, and with great difficulty got home. In March, 1800, he was at court, and appeared intoxicated. Before the next term he was removed into the country.

I saw him in November, 1802, when he conducted himself with more propriety than usual; and in December, 1802, he conversed rationally, and expressed himself with legal accuracy when he attended court. After the court broke up, he said no person ought to object to his getting drunk then. I saw him afterwards drunk, and was obliged to carry him to his carriage.

I saw him on one occasion ask for some spirits; and punch being given to him, he said that was nothing but beverage, and afterwards got brandy.

I was present at court on the 11th and 12th days of November, 1802. When I entered the Judge was on the bench. The statement I have heard given by Mr. Sherburne, Mr. Chadbourn, and Mr. Steele is, I think, correct. On the first day the Judge appeared to me to be intoxicated. I found the deputy marshal on his right hand and — on his left. He called upon some person to come up and sit by him. The person declined. The Judge said if he did not come up, he would come down and cane him; said he had heard enough of the damned case, and damned the revenue. He appeared to be in a state of intoxication; that was the general impression of the bystanders.

I have seen the Judge other times intoxicated; when he staggered, and conversed like a drunken man. I have seen him in a state of intoxication three or four years before the trial; during the same time I have seen him, when he was free from intoxication, when he conversed rationally. I have seen him hold a court and conduct himself in a proper manner. I think I have seen him, within three or four years past, not intoxicated, when he conversed rationally. In the year 1792 I was at Amherst, when Mr. Pickering was chief justice. After a cause was opened, he adjourned the court; it was said he was sick.

Question. Did you ever see Judge Pickering immediately after arising from bed?

Answer. Never.

Question. Did you ever see him when he was apparently perfectly sober?

Answer. I think I have.

Question. Did he then on all subjects speak correctly and rationally, or incoherently and wild?

Answer. He did not speak rationally on all subjects, though he generally conversed correctly; but he would sometimes tell strange stories.

Question. Was he sober when he told you those stories?

Answer. He appeared to be sober.

Question. What were those stories?

Answer. Such as that he had been sent abroad on an embassy; that he had been among the Indian nations, among which he said he performed many exploits, stating them. He would tell these stories immediately after conversing very rationally on other subjects.

Question. At what time did you discover that he began to tell these stories?

Answer. The first I knew of them was in April, 1801, when the circuit court sat. In the Summer of 1800 I heard of his being deranged.

Question. How long before did you understand him to have been in the habit of intoxication?

Answer. So long ago as March 1799.

Question. Did intoxication always appear to deprive him of his reason?

Answer. Yes. It produced extravagant conduct and conversation.

Michael McCleary, Marshal for the District of New Hampshire, sworn.

I was present on the 11th and 12th of November, 1802, at the trial of the libels. I went to the house of the Judge in the morning of the fifth day, and he stated to me the time appointed for holding the court. About that time, I again went to his house. He was not there. I afterwards met him in the streets, and took him by the arm, and led him to a bench. He ordered Mr. Steele to sit along side of him; he likewise ordered another person to come up on the bench, and said if he would not come up he would give him a damned caning. Mr. Livermore examined evidences on the part of the claimant; and after he sat down the Judge said, I decree the restoration of the ship and cables, and my decrees, like those of the Medes and Persians, are irrevocable. This was objected to by Mr. Sherburne, who begged to be indulged with a few remarks. The Judge said, you may go on to all eternity. Some witnesses were examined, when the Judge interrupted the proceedings and ordered the restoration of the vessel. On the fifth day, the Judge said, I'm damned drunk, but I will be sober to-morrow.

On the second day I went to the house of the Judge. He was not at home. In returning I passed a grog-shop, where I saw him with a pint cup in his hand. He was very feeble and could scarcely walk. I put him on the bench. Then came on what has been mentioned before about the decree. He ordered the court to be adjourned. The Judge at first allowed an appeal; Mr. Livermore objected to it, and he then reversed his decision. Mr. Sherburne asked leave to file a bill of exception. The Judge said, yes and be damned.

I saw the Judge in October last. He appeared in a general state of mind. I laid some papers before him that required considerable attention, and he examined them carefully.

Question. Have you seen him when he was quite sober?

Answer. I have, before breakfast. On the 11th of November, early in the morning, he appeared to be free from intoxication. It was notorious that his ill health was brought on by intemperance. I have often heard intemperance ascribed to him when chief justice.

President. When you saw Judge Pickering sober, did he appear in a state of insanity?

Answer. When I last saw him he appeared as well as ever. The woman with whom he lived said she was obliged to give him half a pint of spirits to go to bed with.

PRESIDENT. How long have you been Marshal?

Answer. Two years last May.

PRESIDENT. Had Judge Pickering the general character of drunkenness before he was appointed district judge?

Answer. He had the character of intemperance when chief justice.

Mr. STEELE examined.

Being interrogated, he said that he had been clerk of the court since the year 1789, and that it was generally understood that Judge Pickering's irregularities proceeded from intoxication; that was the general opinion.

PRESIDENT. Has Judge Pickering any property?

Answer. I do not know. He had a house in Portsmouth which was burnt. He also had a farm.

Question. Who manages his property?

Answer. I am unable to say whether he or some other person manages it.

Question. Do you know anything about his salary?

Answer. I have not the least knowledge as to his salary.

Question. When was his house burnt?

Answer. After the trial of the Eliza.

Mr. SHANNON, examined.

He said the prevailing opinion of the inhabitants of New Hampshire, and of those acquainted with Judge Pickering, was, that he was for some time past in the habits of intoxication. He had never heard of anybody having expressed an opinion that he was deranged longer than four years. He frequently saw him, and never conversed with him when deranged from any other cause than liquor. He did not himself believe him deranged. He believed it was so said that he might be kept in office.

The Judge had a house in Portsmouth, which was burnt in December, 1802. He had also another house in the country, in right, the witness believes, of his wife.

Being further interrogated, the witness said, he had known Judge Pickering for thirty-five years; though he was not so well acquainted with him as to visit at his house.

He said Judge Pickering was formerly very temperate. For eight or ten years past he was, by general reputation, in habits of intoxication. The witness never saw the Judge when he thought him insane.

Mr. STEELE being asked how long he had been acquainted with Judge Pickering—answered, for fifteen years.

Mr. NICHOLSON here addressed the Court. He said he wished, in case it should be deemed proper by the Court, to ask one of the witnesses whether he had conversed with the family physician of Judge Pickering, and what his opinion was as to the origination of his insanity. Mr. N. observed that he had doubts of the propriety of this question, and therefore, in the first instance, stated it to the Court.

The Court decided the question inadmissible.

EBENEZER CHADWICK—sworn.

The deponent had been acquainted, though not intimately, with Judge Pickering, about twenty-two years. He was deputy sheriff, when Mr. Pickering was Chief Justice of New Hampshire. He thinks he discovered habits of intoxication in him while a State judge. The first instance he knew was in 1791, when he was Chief Justice. He has frequently seen him intoxicated since judge of the district court. He has seen him stagger, and be obliged to take hold of the fence to support himself. It is near three years since he discovered these symptoms. The general impression of his neighbors is, that he has been a long time in the habit of drinking too freely.

EDWARD HART—sworn.

I have known Judge Pickering for twenty-five or thirty years. I was deputy sheriff when he was Judge of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire. I have never but once before the trial, ten or eleven years ago, seen in him any symptoms of intemperance. On that occasion he was on the bench, and appeared to be sick; he left the court, when I went to him, and then concluded that he was intoxicated. I have frequently seen him since. There was a report of his being in the habit of intoxication, but I never saw him so.

I was present at the trial of the Eliza. I cannot say more of the proceedings on that occasion than has been said by other gentlemen. Whether his conduct arose from insanity or drunkenness I cannot say. It was generally thought at Portsmouth that liquor was the cause of his insanity.

Mr. WHIPPLE, being interrogated, said that he had known Judge Pickering for thirty years; and that about eight years ago, from the face and general appearance of Judge Pickering, he was led to suppose that he was in the habit of intoxication.

[Mr. Whipple was here going on to state some conversation he had with Judge Pickering's physician at this time, which he was induced to ask in consequence of solicitude to gain true information as to the reported intemperance of the Judge; when he was interrupted by the Court, and informed that this species of testimony had been already decided to be inadmissible.]

Question. What was the general opinion respecting Judge Pickering.

Answer. The general opinion was, that he was in habits of intoxication.

Inquiry being made of the witness, as to the knowledge he had of the management of the property of Judge Pickering, and the mode in which he received his salary;—he said, he had seen some post notes within the last four months issued in the name of Judge Pickering, and endorsed by his son, and he understood that he had drawn his salary by the transmission of those notes. The witness had never seen such notes till within these four months past—six months ago he had seen them endorsed by himself.

Mr. NICHOLSON informed the Court, that the managers here closed the testimony they had to offer. Whereupon they withdrew, and the Court adjourned until the next day.

FRIDAY, March 9.

On the suggestion of Mr. TRACY, SIMEON OLcott, and WILLIAM PLUMER, Senators from New Hampshire, were respectively sworn and affirmed.

Mr. OLcott.—I have had an acquaintance with Judge Pickering for more than thirty years last past, but more immediately for about the last thirteen or fourteen years last past; we being justices of the Supreme Court for New Hampshire, for about that term, until he was removed to the district court, during which time we were together, on the circuits, about five months in each year, and generally lodged and travelled together, while on the circuits; and during that term I never knew, heard, or suspected, that said Pickering was at any time intoxicated with, or made excessive use of spirituous liquor. He was often affected with a nervous complaint, or what was called the hypochondria, which sometimes produced extraordinary effects, but he never saw the effect of spirituous liquors, which he thinks he should have noticed, if true, as his seat was generally next to said Pickering, while on the bench. As to the testimony of Mr. Hart I am certain it is in part a mistake, as he says, what he testifies happened before I was on the bench—whereas in fact, I was justice of said court before said Pickering, and continued so after his removal to the district court; as to the fact, as related by said Hart, he has no perfect recollection, but has an idea that said Pickering did once leave the court at Portsmouth and went home, under a complaint of sickness, but he did not think any such cause existed as alleged by said Hart, nor does he believe the same well founded. As to the testimony of Mr. Shannon, so far as it relates to what occurred at the Supreme Court at Amherst, I have a full and perfect recollection of what then took place, as the particular circumstances made a deep impression on my mind; it may be noticed, the Supreme Court of New Hampshire consists of four justices, three of whom were necessary to make a quorum to do business; at the court mentioned by said Shannon, three justices only attended, which were Pickering, Farrar, and myself. After the court had proceeded in business, I think for one or two days, said Pickering, while at our lodgings, and before the opening the court for that day, complained of being very unwell, and objected against going into court, for that reason; but, as the court could not form a quorum for business without him, he was persuaded to make the attempt. After being in court a short time, and having made some progress in business, said Pickering complained of being so unwell as not to be able to keep his seat longer, on which the court adjourned to the next day, hoping he might then be able to attend, but that not happening, it was farther adjourned, and this for three several times, if my recollection serves me; where, from the opinion of the physicians who attended Judge Pickering, there was no probability he would be able to attend (in the court-house) that term, the court was adjourned to his lodgings, in order to complete the business as far as they proceeded; which having done, the court was adjourned without day. The disorder with which said Pickering was affected at that time was a violent dysentery, and his life was thought to be in much danger—and I never heard, or thought, (before said Shannon's testimony) that any person suspected it to be the effect of intemperance; and, from every circumstance by which I can judge, am convinced said testimony is altogether incorrect and erroneous.

Mr. PLUMER.—I have been intimately acquainted with Judge Pickering for near twenty years; within that term he held some of the most important offices in the State, and discharged the duties thereof with great propriety. From 1785 to 1790, I spent much time in company with him, particularly during his attendance in the Legislature, and at the courts of law; and frequently lodged with him at the same house. In 1790, he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of judicature in New Hampshire, and continued until February, 1795, when he was appointed dis-strict judge. When he was chief justice, I was much in company with him, attending the same court, and travelling and lodging with him. During all the time aforesaid, and, I think, until 1800, he was very temperate; and I have no recollection of seeing him once disguised with intoxicating liquors. His reputation for temperance and sobriety were fair and general. I never heard a suggestion of his being intemperate, until after I was informed of his insanity, which was about four years since. I have seen him many times within the last four years; sometimes he was intoxicated, at other times he was sober; but when wholly free from intoxication he appeared to me to be in a state of insanity. On some subjects he conversed more rationally than on others; but on particular subjects he was wild and incoherent. He was formerly remarkable for the chastity and delicacy of his language; but, in the last four years, he was often profane, and sometimes obscene. I saw him within a week after the trial of the libels mentioned in the impeachment. At the first instance he was sober, but quite insane; at the second, he appeared intoxicated.

I saw him two days before I left the State, (the 30th September last,) at Newington, where he then lived. He was then altogether free from intoxication, although he had spirituous liquors at his command, and took some from a closet, and urged me to drink. He then conversed on some subjects rationally, but on others was incoherent, wild, and extravagant. He appeared weak, emaciated, and, from bodily infirmities, was then, in my opinion, unable to bear the fatigues of a journey to this place.

The judge, for many years, has been subject to nervous and hypochondriac complaints, and these have increased till they have produced what, I think, is a state of confirmed insanity. I believe (for I am required to give my opinion) that his insanity was the cause of his intemperance. Though I think it not improbable that, after his insanity had produced a degree of intemperance, the intemperance and insanity might then act mutually as cause and effect; but I have no doubt that the insanity preceded the intemperance.

Mr. Shannon, being interrogated, said that the first he had heard of Judge Pickering being in habits of intoxication was in the year 1792. About four or five years ago, he saw him intoxicated, and he has frequently seen him drunk since.

Mr. Hart deposed that Judge Pickering, in 1792, had not been in court more than half an hour before he appeared intoxicated, when he left the bench. He was induced to believe his sickness arose from intoxication, from having smelt his breath, which clearly smelt of liquor. The deponent at the time communicated the circumstance to Mr. Chadwick.

Mr. Chadwick said he recollected that, about nine or ten years ago, there had been a laugh raised against the judge on that account.

Mr. Steele said he had been clerk of the court ever since 1789. The first he had heard of the intoxication of Judge Pickering, was about seven years ago. In October, 1799, he was so intoxicated that he could not get into court. He never heard of his insanity till April, 1800. His conjecture was, that the report of insanity was raised as a cover to his intoxication. He thinks he heard the report of insanity from the connexions of Judge Pickering. The general report was, that he was intoxicated.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that the managers would withdraw for a few minutes.

The managers having, in a short time, returned, Mr. NICHOLSON, in their behalf, addressed the Court, and said the managers of the House of Representatives considered the testimony offered in support of the articles of impeachment so conclusive and pointed, as to render it impossible for them to elucidate or enforce it by any observations in their power to make. He was, therefore, directed by the managers to inform the Court that they submitted the articles on the evidence offered, entertaining no doubt of full justice being done by the decision of the Senate.

Whereupon the managers retired.

Mr. TRACY offered the following motion:

Resolved, As the opinion of this Court, that the proceedings on the articles of impeachment, exhibited by the House of Representatives, against John Pickering, be postponed to the — day of — next.

It passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith of Ohio, John Smith of New York, Samuel Smith, Stone, Sumter, Venable, Worthington, and Wright.

The Court then adjourned to the next day.

SATURDAY, March 10.

Mr. FRANKLIN was chosen President pro tem. Upon the opening of the Court, Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Court is not at present prepared to give their final decision upon the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors, the said John Pickering not having appeared, or been heard by himself or by counsel; and it having been suggested to the Court by Jacob S. Pickering, son of the said John Pickering, that the said John Pickering, at the time of the conduct charged against him in the said articles of impeachment, as high crimes and misdemeanors, was, and yet is, insane, which suggestion has been supported by the testimony of two members of the Court, and by the affidavits of sundry persons, whose integrity is unimpeached; and it being further suggested in the said petition, that at such future day as the Court may appoint, the body of the said Pickering shall be produced in Court, and further testimony in his behalf, which will enable the Court to judge for themselves as to the insanity of the said John Pickering, and to act more understandingly in the premises; but that the said John Pickering, owing to bodily infirmity, could not be brought to Court at present, at so great a distance, and at this inclement season of the year, without imminent hazard of his life.

Trial of Judge Pickering.

Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. WRIGHT, and other gentlemen, objected to the resolution as not being in order.

Mr. ANDERSON asked if it would be in order to move an amendment to it?

Mr. ADAMS said, he would object to any amendment to it, as, by the rule of the Court, a gentleman had a right to a vote upon any specific proposition he might please to submit, connected with the trial.

Mr. WHITE called for the reading of the rule.

Mr. ANDERSON then moved that the resolution, submitted by the gentleman from Virginia yesterday, be taken up as being entitled to be acted upon first.

The President pro tem. declared that the resolution of the gentleman from Delaware was fairly before the Court, and must be disposed of in some way before anything else could be taken up.

A motion for postponing the further consideration of it was then made and withdrawn.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped it would not be permitted to go upon the Journals of the Court.

Mr. JACKSON moved the previous question, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. WHITE hoped that whatever question should be taken on the subject, should be by yeas and nays; that his resolution, and the manner in which it might be got rid of, should be seen and understood.

Mr. ANDERSON then moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "not having been heard by himself or counsel;" and all after the words "was and yet is insane," to the end of the resolution.

On motion of Mr. DAYTON, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed.

At three o'clock the doors were opened, and the question was taken upon the resolution as at first submitted—yeas 9, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith of Ohio, Sam'l Smith, Sumter, Venable, Worthington, and Wright.

So it passed in the negative.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the resolution he had submitted the day before for notifying the House of Representatives that the Court would be prepared to pronounce judgment on Monday next, was taken up and passed—yeas 20, nays 9. Those who voted in the affirmative last above, here voted in the negative, and so vice versa, except Mr. JOHN SMITH, of New York, who was not then present, and who voted here in the negative.

The Court then adjourned.

MONDAY, March 12.

The Court being opened, Mr. WHITE inquired how the question was to be taken; whether upon each article separately, as is practised in the House of Lords, or upon the whole together? He hoped upon each separately, as gentlemen might wish to vote affirmatively on some and negatively on others, from which privilege they must be precluded by giving but one general vote of guilty or not guilty. He would, therefore, beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Court the following, as the form of the question to be put to each member upon each article of impeachment, viz:

"Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the charges contained in the — article of impeachment, or not guilty?"

For this form of question, Mr. W. observed, he could adduce precedent; it was nearly the same as was used in the very celebrated case of Warren Hastings, and he presumed would collect the sense of the Court with as much certainty as any that could be proposed, which was his only object.

After some conversation, Mr. ANDERSON moved the following as the form, and prayed that it might be taken up:

"Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the — article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?"

The President pro tem. declared that it would not be in order to take it up till the motion of the gentleman from Delaware was acted upon, as it was first before the Court, and had not yet been disposed of in any way; and was about to put the question following upon it, when—

Mr. ANDERSON mentioned that he had objections to the form of question proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, and moved to strike out the words "of high crimes and misdemeanors."

On motion, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed. After some debate, Mr. WHITE's form of question was lost—only ten voting in favor of it, and eighteen against it.

Mr. ANDERSON's form was then adopted—yeas 18, nays 9, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

Mr. WHITE stated, that he believed Judge Pickering had practised much of the indecent and improper conduct charged against him in the articles of impeachment; that he had been seen intoxicated, and heard to use very profane language upon the bench; that he had acted illegally and very unbecomingly a judge in the case of the ship Eliza, as charged against him in the articles, but that he was very far from believing that any part of his conduct amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, or that he was in any degree capable of such an offence, because, after the testimony the Court had heard, scarcely a doubt could remain in the mind of any gentleman, but that the judge was actually insane at the time; and Mr. W. wished to know whether it was to be understood, by the two last votes just taken, that the Court intended only to find the facts, and to avoid pronouncing the law upon them; that they could have it in view to say merely, that Judge Pickering had committed the particular acts charged against him in the articles of impeachment, and, upon such a conviction, to remove him, without saying directly or indirectly whether those acts amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors or not; for, in the several articles they are not so charged, though judgment is demanded upon them as such. Upon such a principle, and by such a mode of proceeding, good behaviour, he observed, would be no longer the tenure of office; every officer of the Government must be at the mercy of a majority of Congress, and it will not hereafter be necessary that a man should be guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in order to render him liable to removal from office by impeachment; but a conviction upon any facts stated in articles exhibited against him will be sufficient.

Trial of Judge Pickering.

Mr. DAYTON observed, that the honorable gentleman from Virginia seemed to be offended at the language of his honorable friend from Delaware, who, in speaking of the proceedings on the impeachment, had called them a mere mockery of trial. To such terms, however, the ears of that honorable gentleman must be accustomed and accommodated, for, whilst either he or his friend had the honor of a seat in that body, they should designate this trial by no other character. It deserved no better appellation, and would be thus characterized in all parts of the United States where these proceedings could be seen and understood.

That the conclusion of this exhibition might perfectly correspond with its commencement and progress; that the catastrophe might comport with the other parts of the piece; the Senate were now to be compelled, by a determined majority, to take the question in a manner never before heard of on similar occasions. They were simply to be allowed to vote, whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the sentence was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime and misdemeanor. The latent reason of this course was, Mr. D. said, too obvious. There were numbers who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge, upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved, who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane, and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment. The Constitution gave no power to the Senate, as the High Court of Impeachments, to pass such a sentence of removal and disqualification, except upon charges and conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors. The House of Representatives had so charged the judge, and had exhibited articles in maintenance and support, as they themselves declare, of those charges. The Senate had received and heard the evidence adduced by the managers, and had gone through certain forms of a trial, and they now, by a majority, dictate the form of a final question, the most extraordinary, unprecedented, and unwarrantable. For himself, Mr. D. said, he felt at a loss how to act. He was free to declare that he believed the respondent guilty of most of the facts stated in the articles, but, considering the deranged state of intellect of that unfortunate man, he could not declare him guilty in the words of the Constitution; he could not vote it a conviction under the impeachment. Let the question be stated, as had been proposed by his honorable friend from Delaware, agreeably to the form observed in the well-remembered case of Warren Hastings—"Is John Pickering guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor upon the charge contained in the first, the second, the third, or the fourth article of the impeachment, or not guilty?" Or, if the Court preferred it, he should have no objection against taking the preliminary question, whether guilty of the facts charged in each article, provided they would allow it to be followed by another most important question, viz: whether those facts, thus proved and found, amounted to a conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors, as charged in the impeachment, and expressly required by the Constitution. Both these forms of stating the question were, it was now too evident, intended to be refused by the majority, and thus a precedent established for removing a judge in a manner unauthorized by that charter.

Mr. WHITE asked whether, after the question now before the Court—which goes merely to settle, as gentlemen themselves believe, the point whether Judge Pickering has committed the particular acts charged against him in the articles of impeachment or not—should be decided, it would then be in his power to obtain a vote of the Court upon another question which, without presenting at present, he would state in his place, viz: Is it the opinion of this Court that John Pickering is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, upon the charges exhibited against him in the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDENT pro tem. replied that he thought such a motion could not be received after the vote had been taken.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following as the final question, viz: Is the Court of opinion that John Pickering be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire? Carried.

Messrs. Armstrong, Bradley, Stone, Dayton, and White, retired from the court. The two last not because they believed Judge Pickering guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, but because they did not choose to be compelled to give so solemn a vote upon a form of question which they considered an unfair one, and calculated to preclude them from giving any distinct and explicit opinion upon the true and most important point in the cause, viz: as to the insanity of Judge Pickering, and whether the charges contained in the articles of impeachment, if true, amounted in him to high crimes and misdemeanors or not.

Trial of Judge Pickering.

The questions were then taken in the presence of the managers, and of the House of Representatives, and decided as follows:

And on the question—Is John Pickering, district judge of New Hampshire, guilty, as charged in the first article of impeachment, exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

It was determined in the affirmative—19 yeas, 7 nays:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, I. Smith, S. Smith, John Smith of New York, Sumter, Venable, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, and Wells.

The same question was put, in the same way, upon the three remaining articles, and decided by a like result.

On the question—Is the Court of opinion that John Pickering be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire?

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 6:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Nicholas, Potter, I. Smith, S. Smith, J. Smith of Ohio, John Smith of New York, Sumter, Venable, Wells, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, and Tracy.

The Court then adjourned sine die.

Early in the trial a question was raised as to the propriety of those gentlemen, viz: Samuel Smith, Israel Smith, and John Smith, of New York, who were during the last session members of the House of Representatives, and voted here upon the question for impeaching Judge Pickering, sitting and voting as judges upon the trial.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, wished to be excused.

Mr. S. SMITH declared that he would not be influenced from his duty by any false delicacy; that he, for his part, felt no delicacy upon the subject, the vote he had given in the other House to impeach Judge Pickering, would have no influence upon him in the court; his constituents had a right to his vote, and he would not by any act of his deprive or consent to deprive them of that right, but would claim and exercise it upon this as upon every other question that might be submitted to the Senate whilst he had the honor of a seat.

Upon the vote, it was carried by the usual majority.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE EIGHTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1803.

MONDAY, October 17, 1803.

This being the day appointed by a Proclamation of the President of the United States, of the sixteenth of July last, for the meeting of Congress, the following members of the House of Representatives appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats, to wit:

liam Kennedy, Nathaniel Macon, Richard Stanford, Marmaduke Williams, Joseph Winston, and Thomas Wynns.

From Tennessee—George Washington Campbell, William Dickson, and John Rhea.

From South Carolina—William Butler, Levi Casey, John Earle, Wade Hampton, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Moore, and Richard Winn.

From Ohio—Jeremiah Morrow.

And a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number, being present, the House proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a Speaker; and upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found to be in favor of NATHANIEL MACON, one of the Representatives from the State of North Carolina: Whereupon, Mr. MACON was conducted to the Chair, from whence he made his acknowledgments to the House, as follows:

"Gentlemen: Accept my unfeigned thanks for the honor which you have conferred on me. The task which you have assigned me will be undertaken with great diffidence, but my utmost endeavors shall be exerted to discharge the duties of the Chair with fidelity. In executing the rules and orders of the House, I shall rely with confidence on the liberal and candid support of the House."

The House proceeded, in the same manner, to the appointment of a Clerk; and upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of JOHN BECKLEY.

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States, as prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths," was administered by Mr. NICHOLSON, one of the Representatives from the State of Maryland, to the SPEAKER; and then the same oath or affirmation was administered by Mr. SPEAKER to all the members present.

WILLIAM LATTIMORE having also appeared, as the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, the said oath was administered to him by the SPEAKER.

The same oath, together with the oath of office prescribed by the said recited act, was also administered by Mr. SPEAKER to the Clerk.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that a quorum of this House is assembled, and have elected NATHANIEL MACON, one of the Representatives for North Carolina, their Speaker; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business; and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, the Senate have elected the honorable JOHN BROWN their President, pro tempore.

Resolved, That Mr. J. RANDOLPH, jun., Mr. R. GRISWOLD, and Mr. NICHOLSON, be appointed a committee, on the part of this House, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

Ordered, That the rules and orders, established by the late House of Representatives, shall be deemed and taken to be the rules and orders of proceeding to be observed in this House, until a revision or alteration of the same shall take place.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceeding as are proper to be observed in this House; and that Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. NEW, and Mr. HUGER, be the said committee.

The following committees were appointed pursuant to the standing rules and orders of the House, viz:

Committee of Elections—Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. M. CLAY, Mr. HUNT, Mr. VARNUM, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. KENNEDY.

Committee of Claims—Mr. J. C. SMITH, Mr. GREGG, Mr. PLATER, Mr. HOLMES, Mr. T. MOORE, Mr. CHAMBERLIN, and Mr. BEDINGER.

Committee of Commerce and Manufactures—Mr. S. L. MITCHELL, Mr. DANA, Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, Mr. MCCREERY, Mr. LEIB, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. WYNNS.

Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business—Mr. TENNEY, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. DICKSON.

Committee of Ways and Means—Mr. J. RANDOLPH, jun., Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. R. GRISWOLD, Mr. RODNEY, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. J. CLAY, and Mr. SANDS.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

The House proceeded to consider the foregoing resolution of the Senate.

Ordered, That the farther consideration thereof be postponed until Thursday next.

The House then proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms to this House; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of JOSEPH WHEATON.

THOMAS CLAXTON was appointed Doorkeeper, and THOMAS DUNN Assistant Doorkeeper.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers to each member, such as the members, respectively, shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings; and that if any member shall choose to take any newspaper other than a daily paper, he shall be furnished with as many of such papers as shall not exceed the price of a daily paper.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

Resolved, That, unless otherwise ordered, the daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned, during the present session, be eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. DAWSON, after a few preliminary observations, offered to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

That, in all future elections of President and Vice President, the persons shall be particularly designated, by declaring which is voted for as President, and which as Vice President.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry papers transmitted to him from Kenawha county, in the State of Virginia, touching the election of Thomas Lewis, one of the members returned to serve in this House, for the said State; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jr., from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make to them, reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President signified to them that he would make a communication to this House, to-day, in writing.

A Communication was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to the two Houses of Congress. The said Communication was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. [See Senate Proceedings of this date, for the Message, ante page 11.]

TUESDAY, October 18.

Several other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN B. C. LUCAS; from Maryland, DANIEL HEISTER; from Virginia, JOHN CLOPTON, and JOHN TRIGG; from North Carolina, SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE; and from Georgia, DAVID MERIWETHER; appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

OCTOBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States; and that the said committee have power to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. THOMAS, Mr. WALTON, Mr. HANNA, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. ALEXANDER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether any further provisions are necessary for the more effectual protection of American seamen.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. SANDS, Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. KNIGHT, Mr. EPES, and Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Clerk, accompanying a memorial of Samuel J. Cabell, of Amherst county, in Virginia, with sundry depositions and other papers relating to the contested election of Thomas M. Randolph, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the district composed of the counties of Albemarle, Amherst, and Fluvanna, in the said State; likewise, sundry other depositions and papers in the case of the contested election of Thomas Lewis, another of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State of Virginia, which were addressed to him during the late recess of Congress; and also the copy of a contract entered into by him for printing certain documents, in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the twenty-fifth of February last.

The memorial of Samuel J. Cabell was read, and, together with the depositions and other papers relating to the contested elections of members for Virginia, ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the regulations proper to be observed by foreign armed vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States; to the restraining of our citizens from entering into the service of the belligerent Powers of Europe; and to the exacting from all nations the observance, towards our vessels and citizens, of those principles and practices which all civilized people acknowledge; be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the adopting of measures for preventing the flag of the United States from being used by vessels not really American, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

3. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our finances, ought to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions, and the same being again read, were agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, JR., Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE, Mr. GAYLORD GRISWOLD, Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, Mr. BLACKLEDGE, Mr. RODNEY, and Mr. JOHN RHEA, of Tennessee, be appointed a committee pursuant to the first resolution.

WEDNESDAY, October 19.

Another member, to wit: PETER EARLY, from Georgia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Ordered, That Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, Mr. HOUGH, Mr. CLOPTON, and Mr. STANFORD, be added to the committee appointed yesterday, to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the proposition amendatory to the Constitution, offered on Monday by Mr. DAWSON, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, namely:

"That in all future elections of President and Vice President, the persons voted for shall be particularly designated, by declaring which is voted for as President, and which as Vice President."

Mr. NICHOLSON said, the proposition now under consideration contemplated an important amendment of the Constitution, and he thought it the duty of the House to render it so plain and intelligible, that hereafter no room should be left for doubt. The circumstances attending the election of the present Chief Magistrate were uncommon in their nature, and he believed had left an almost universal impression upon the public mind, that some amendment to the Constitution should be adopted. In doing this, however, it was necessary that the amendment should clearly and precisely express the meaning of those who are to adopt it as a rule for the future government of their conduct. The motion before the committee was sufficiently correct as far as it went, but, in his opinion, if that alone were to be agreed to, the Constitution itself would be extremely equivocal, and future Legislatures would be involved in difficulties not very far inferior to those from which we are anxious to relieve them. The Constitution, as it now stands, provides that the Electors shall assemble and vote for two persons, that the votes thus given shall be sealed up and sent to the President of the Senate, and by him shall be opened in presence of both Houses of Congress, and that the person having the greatest number of votes, if such number be a majority of all the Electors appointed, shall be the President; but if more than one have an equal number, then the House of Representatives is to choose one of them as President; and if no person has a majority, then the House are to choose from the five highest on the list one of them as President. In all cases, however, it is further provided, after the choice of a President, the person having the greatest number of votes shall be the Vice President. Thus the Constitution now stands; but if it is amended in the manner proposed, it may be extremely uncertain what part of the original Constitution is annulled, and what is to remain in force. These are to be left to future construction. To make himself more fully comprehended, Mr. N. said he would suppose a case. After adopting the proposed amendment, A and B being voted for as President, have an equal number of the votes of the Electors, neither having a majority, and C and D have an equal number of votes; neither of these having a majority. In such an event, the Constitution as it now stands provides that the House of Representatives shall choose a President from the five highest on the list, and unless this provision is annulled by the amendment now proposed, a person voted for by the Electors, as Vice President, may be chosen by this House as President. Again, A and B being voted for as President, have an equal number of votes, but neither of them has a majority; C, D, and E, being voted for as Vice President, have likewise an equal number of votes, but neither of them have as great a number as the two first. Here, agreeably to the Constitution as it now stands, after the President is chosen, the person having the greatest number of votes is to be the Vice President, and of course the choice must fall upon a man who has not been voted for by the Electors as Vice President, but upon one who has been voted for as President. If these difficulties occur at this time, they will certainly present themselves with much more force, when the facts alluded to happen; and that they may happen no one can deny. To prevent these difficulties, Mr. N. said, was his object, and for this purpose he had prepared an amendment to the proposition under consideration. Too extensive a latitude of construction, he had always thought dangerous; as a very great difference of construction might honestly be given by different men. The committee would discover, after hearing the amendment which he was about to offer, that although he might be mistaken in the opinions he had offered, yet the safest course would be to adopt it. He was anxious to prevent all possibility of doubt on future occasions, and to make that clear and unequivocal, which in his opinion would otherwise be involved in obscurity. He then offered the following amendment to the proposition originally moved by Mr. DAWSON

“The person voted for as President, having the greatest number of votes, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of all the Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the five highest on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them as President. And in every case, the person voted for as Vice President having the greatest number of votes, shall be the Vice President. But if there should be two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose one of them for Vice President.”

Mr. DAWSON observed that the resolution offered by him was, in his opinion, sufficiently clear and precise. But as the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) thought otherwise, he had no objection to the amendment proposed by him.

Mr. CLOPTON said, that he approved of the principle introduced in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) but he considered the amendment as liable to some objection; that it was susceptible of objection inasmuch as it proposed to extend to this House a right of deciding the election, by choosing a President among five persons in case an event should happen so as to render their decision necessary; and that the same objection might be raised to that part of it which related to the election of Vice President, in case the interposition of the Senate should become necessary for that purpose. He said that, if the gentleman from Maryland would permit the word “five” to be struck out, and the word “two” to be inserted, he thought the amendment would then be more conformable to the principles of a representative Government. Mr. C. said, that the reason which induced the extension of a right to make a legislative decision from the five highest on the list, in case no person should have a majority of electoral votes, arose from a circumstance, which could not happen if the proposed amendment to the Constitution should be adopted. He said the circumstance he alluded to was, that under the existing mode, which requires each Elector to vote for two persons indiscriminately, without designating whether for President or for Vice President, there might be four persons, each of whom might have a number of votes, but a little less than a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and it might so happen that five persons might have a number equal to two-fifths of the whole number. He said that, therefore, it appeared proper to him that the right of choosing from the five highest on the list should be extended to the Legislature under the existing mode, as two-fifths were so considerable a proportion of the whole number; but, if the proposed amendment (which requires that the persons voted for should be designated whether voted for as President or as Vice President) should be adopted, the reason which existed and heretofore rendered the provision a proper one, will then entirely cease; for each of even two persons cannot then have a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, either on the list designated for President or on the list designated for Vice President. As, therefore, the operation of the resolution, if agreed to and adopted as an amendment to the Constitution, will so materially differ from the operation of the existing mode, he thought the alteration he proposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland would be expedient. He said he begged leave to state a case, which might happen even at the next election, if that amendment should be introduced into the resolution without the alteration he proposed. He said that, at the next election, there will be 176 Electors; and it might so happen that one person might have 86 votes, a second person might have 87 votes, a third person might have 1 vote, a fourth person might have 1 vote, and a fifth person might have 1 vote. If, therefore, the number five, as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland should be retained, either of those persons to whom only one electoral vote had been given might be chosen; and both of those persons, one of whom had 86 votes, the other 87 votes, might be rejected.

Mr. C. said, that he could not conceive that any member of this Committee would agree that such a decision could be proper, or any way consistent with the vital principles of our Government. He therefore wished that the gentleman from Maryland would consent to the alteration he had the honor to suggest to the Committee, and after the clause immediately succeeding the word proposed to be struck out, words to this effect might be added:

"If, on the list designated for President, no person shall have a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, then, from the two highest on that list, the House of Representatives shall choose, by ballot, one of them for President; unless more than two persons shall have an equal number of votes, in which case the said House shall, in like manner, choose one of those persons for President."

Mr. CLOPTON said that a similar clause might be inserted in relation to a final decision of the election of Vice President, in case no person should have a majority of the electoral votes on the list designated for Vice President.

Mr. C. said, that he believed the provision, if conformed to the ideas suggested by him, would be more likely to insure the ultimate election of President and Vice President according to the will of the people, as the electoral votes are to be considered as their expression of the public will, than if the amendment should be agreed to exactly as proposed by the gentleman from Maryland; and if the alteration suggested did not obtain his assent, he (Mr. C.) begged leave to move the Committee to that effect.

Mr. NICHOLSON could not say that he had any material objection to the amendment recommended by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLOPTON.) In framing the resolution he had submitted, he had pursued the language of the Constitution, by inserting the word "five." The object of the gentleman might be obtained by striking out the word "five." To give time, however, for the House to reflect on the subject, and to compare the several propositions, he would move that the Committee should rise.

This motion was carried without dissent; when the House ordered the resolutions to be printed.

ABUSE OF THE AMERICAN FLAG.

Mr. MITCHILL moved that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures may be discharged, and that the measures for preventing the flag of the United States from being used by vessels not really American, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. DANA.—I am of opinion that the Committee of Commerce is more proper to investigate the business in question than a select committee. It is more of a commercial nature. I have known several instances where people have come to this country to get naturalized, for the evident purpose of holding the shipping of this country in their names, and then returning to their real country, and to their allegiance to their Prince. An American Consul of the United States, in Europe, had sometime suspected these practices, and he determined to investigate the matter. For this purpose, on the next arrival of the vessels into the port of his consulship, he made the most minute inquiries into the situations of the owners. He found one of these owners to be second officer, in the city and port of arrival, and that he had actually come over to America to be naturalized, in order to entitle him to this privilege. This, and other instances which have come under my observation, convinces me that the inquiry is of a commercial nature, and I therefore hope and trust the Committee of Commerce will stand.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH did not think it material which committee it was referred to. He never thought a flag at the mast-head sufficient to cover property; and the meaning of the President must be, to comprise the whole security of our commerce; a Committee of Commerce, however, he thought most proper; it could be provided for in one and the same bill, yet it would make but little difference.

Mr. GRISWOLD observed, that it was a matter of no great importance to which committee it was referred. The object was fully and fairly to identify that we are Americans; that we do not wish to cover property not bona fide our own, and that we are ready to punish rogues who represent us. The principal proof, continued Mr. G., is the register, but our further object will be to furnish our vessels with other certificates of property. The business is, therefore, best, upon the whole, with a Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MITCHILL withdrew his motion, to make another, that the select committee be discharged.

Carried—yeas 55, nays 40.

MOURNING FOR SAMUEL ADAMS.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed, that it had lately been announced to the public that one of the earliest patriots of the Revolution had paid his last debt to nature. He had hoped that some other gentleman, better qualified for the task, would have undertaken to call the attention of the House to this interesting event. It could not, indeed, be a matter of deep regret that one of the first statesmen of our country has descended to the grave full of years and full of honors; that his character and fame were put beyond the reach of that time and chance to which everything mortal is exposed; but it became the House to cherish a sentiment of veneration for such men—since such men are rare—and to keep alive the spirit to which they owed the Constitution under which they were then deliberating. This great man, the associate of Hancock, shared with him the honor of being proscribed by a flagitious Ministry, whose object was to triumph over the liberties of their country, by trampling on those of her colonies. With his great compatriot he made an early and decided stand against British encroachment, whilst souls more timid, were trembling and irresolute. It is the glorious privilege of minds of this stamp to give an impulse to a people and fix the destiny of nations.

Mr. R. said, that he felt himself every way unequal to the attempt of doing justice to the merits of their departed countryman. Called upon by the occasion to say something, he could not have said less. He would not, by any poor eulogium of his, enfeeble the sentiment which pervaded the House, but content himself with moving the following resolution:

Resolved, unanimously, That this House is penetrated with a full sense of the eminent services rendered to his country in the most arduous times by the late Samuel Adams, deceased; and that the members thereof wear crape on the left arm for one month, in testimony of the national gratitude and reverence towards the memory of that undaunted and illustrious patriot.

Mr. ELLIOT spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: If any apology could be necessary for a new member, unversed in Parliamentary proceedings, to offer for rising so early in the session, it would be, that the topic which arrests his attention is connected with the illustrious and ever memorable name of Samuel Adams. The eloquence of the gentleman from Virginia I shall not attempt to rival; his remarks were peculiarly impressive, and the more so from his remarking that he was unable to do justice to the subject. I have been extremely affected by his calling the attention of the House to the circumstance that the name of that patriot was united with that of John Hancock, in an exemption from the general pardon which the British Government offered to those American revolutionists, whom they dared to style rebels. The longer I should address the House upon this subject, the more feeble would be my language, as the greater would be my sensibility. I shall, therefore, only further observe, that I shall most cordially support the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion; which was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that, on occasions like the present, it had been usual for the House to adjourn. He, therefore, moved an adjournment; which was carried.

THURSDAY, October 20.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL THATCHER; from New York, JOHN SMITH; and from Maryland, JOHN ARCHER; appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

The House then proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Rev. WILLIAM PARKINSON.

Mr. NEW, from the committee appointed, on the seventeenth instant, to prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceeding as are proper to be observed in this House, made report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, that during the last session the House had voted an impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court for New-Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors. But the impeachment had been voted at so late a period of the session, as rendered it impossible to act then finally upon it. In order that it might be now acted upon, and the impeachment proceed, he moved the appointment of a committee, to prepare articles of impeachment, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

The motion was immediately taken up, agreed to and a committee of five appointed viz: Messrs. NICHOLSON, J. RANDOLPH, R. GRISWOLD, EARLY, and THATCHER.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. NICHOLSON, after making a few preliminary remarks, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the propositions amendatory of the Constitution of the United States; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. N. then moved a reference of the propositions to a committee of seventeen, composed of one member from each State; which motion was agreed to, and the following members named of the committee: Messrs. Dawson, Betton, Butler, Stanton, Dana, Elliot, J. Smith of New York, Smilie, Rodney, Nicholson, Stanford, Blackledge, G. W. Campbell, Winn, Meriwether, Morrow, and Lattimore.

Mr. HUGER observed it would be recollected, by those gentlemen who had been members of the preceding Congress, that the propositions to designate the President and Vice President, in future elections, had originated in the State of New York, and been submitted to the consideration of Congress, in a resolution to that effect, from the Legislature of that respectable State. It would be recollected however by gentlemen, that the resolution in question, which had just been committed to a select committee, was accompanied by another, having for its object to divide the United States into election, and, to a certain extent, permanent districts, in all future Presidential elections; he thought therefore that, from respect to the State of New York, the latter as well as the first proposition should receive the attention of the House, and be equally referred to the select committee. He professed himself indeed to have little inclination or rather a great disinclination to make any changes in the Federal Constitution. He was sincerely attached to and perfectly satisfied with it as it now stands. The prosperity we had enjoyed under it, and the experience we had, made it a matter of great doubt with him, whether we should not lose more than we should gain by any alteration of this our great bond of Union. Nevertheless, as he was aware that a change in the Constitutional provision for electing the President and Vice President was a favorite point with many gentlemen, and from everything he could collect would in some shape or other be effected, he thought, as he had before observed, that respect alone for the State in which the business had originated, should lead us to take up and consider both of the resolutions recommended to us by New York. He would acknowledge, moreover, that his impressions were in general favorable to district elections. But as he presumed there would be no opposition to the motion for a reference to the committee of the resolution he held in his hand, he should not enter into any further argument in support of it. He would simply move, that the following resolution be submitted to the consideration of the select committee which had just been raised, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, to wit:

That the State Legislatures shall, from time to time, divide each State into districts, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives from such State in the Congress of the United States; and shall direct the mode of choosing an Elector of President, and Vice President in each of the said districts, who shall be chosen by citizens having the qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and that the districts so to be constituted, shall consist, as nearly as may be, of contiguous territory and of equal proportion of population, except where there may be any detached portion of territory, not of itself sufficient to form a district, which then shall be annexed to some other portion nearest thereto; which districts, when so divided, shall remain unaltered until a new census of the United States shall be taken.

The resolution was referred to the aforesaid committee—yeas 63.

Before the question of reference was taken, Mr. VARNUM inquired whether the concurrence of two-thirds, or of a simple majority, was required on points preliminary to the final adoption of amendments to the Constitution.

The SPEAKER observed that, according to the usage of the House, a simple majority was competent.

FRIDAY, October 21.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, JOHN PATTERSON and ERASTUS ROOT, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

Resolved, That the resolution of the tenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and one, authorizing Thomas Claxton to employ an additional assistant, two servants, and two horses, be, and the same is hereby, continued in force during this and the next session: and that the said Thos. Claxton be allowed a further sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents, to be paid in like manner, to enable him to increase the number of his attendants.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed the Rev. Dr. GANTT, a Chaplain to Congress, on their part.

SATURDAY, October 22.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In my communication to you of the 17th instant, I informed you that Conventions had been entered into with the Government of France for the cession of Louisiana to the United States. These, with the advice and consent of the Senate, having now been ratified, and my ratification exchanged for that of the First Consul of France, in due form, they are communicated to you for consideration in your Legislative capacity. You will observe that some important conditions cannot be carried into execution, but with the aid of the Legislature; and that time presses a decision on them without delay.

The ulterior provisions, also suggested in the same communication, for the occupation and government of the country, will call for early attention. Such information relative to its government, as time and distance have permitted me to obtain, will be ready to be laid before you within a few days. But, as permanent arrangements for this object may require time and deliberation, it is for your consideration whether you will not, forthwith, make such temporary provisions for the preservation, in the meanwhile, of order and tranquillity in the country, as the case may require.

OCT. 21, 1803. TH. JEFFERSON.

Mr. HUGER hoped the reading of the treaty and conventions would be dispensed with, and that they would be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped they would be read.

The reading of course was proceeded with, which being finished,

Mr. RANDOLPH moved a reference of the Message, and of the documents accompanying it, to the whole House on Monday; which motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH begged leave to submit a resolution, arising out of the Message, which he hoped would be considered at that time, for the purpose of referring it to the same committee to whom had been just referred the Message:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for carrying into effect the treaty and convention concluded at Paris on the 30th April, 1803, between the United States of America and the French Republic.

Referred to the same committee, without a division.

Mr. LEIB said that during the last session a bill had passed the House for reducing the Marine Corps, but which had been arrested in the Senate. From the present circumstances of the country, it appeared to him a proper subject for consideration. He therefore submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations are necessary in the several acts relative to the establishment of a Marine Corps, and in an act fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the Corps of Marines: and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Agreed to, and a committee of five appointed, viz: MESSRS. LEIB, JACKSON, CUTTS, L. WILLIAMS, and OLIN.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee to whom had been referred two propositions of amendment to the Constitution, made a report in part, as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the different States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution, viz:

"In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person having a majority of all the Electors appointed as President shall be the President; and if there shall be no such majority, the President shall be chosen from the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list for President, by the House of Representatives, in the manner directed by the Constitution. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President; and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution."

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE LOUISIANA TREATY.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the House would recollect a report made during the last session having relation to the subject of the Message of the President, delivered that morning, which had been acted upon at a late day. The report it had been thought inexpedient to publish at that time. As tending to throw light on the important subject before the House, and as a very able composition of a gentleman not then in his place, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) he thought it worthy of publication. He therefore moved its reference to the committee to whom the Message had been committed, and would afterwards move that it should be printed for the use of the members.

The SPEAKER doubted whether it was in order to receive such a motion respecting a paper which had been considered confidential.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he would withdraw his motion for the present, and bring it forward at a future time in a less objectionable shape.

Mr. GREGG observed that, if his memory did not fail, the injunction of secrecy was taken off, though there had been no resolution for printing the report. He regretted it had not been published last session. If his impression was correct, it might now be published.

Mr. RANDOLPH said his friend from Pennsylvania would perceive a very cogent reason for not publishing the report at that time. Its contents rendered it inexpedient to publish it till the negotiations then depending should be terminated one way or the other. That reason had ceased, and the report might therefore be published. As it appeared necessary to clear the galleries before the injunction of secrecy could be taken off, he hoped that measure would be adopted before an adjournment took place. He would not, however, offer such motion until any other important business coming before the House might be attended to.

Mr. DANA inquired whether there was on the public Journal any notice of the report alluded to. If there were, they could act upon it in public; if there were not, they could not act.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—What, Mr. Speaker, is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER said there was no question before the House.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The Speaker having decided that there is no question before the House, all this conversation is out of order.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—There is nobody out of order but the gentleman himself. His colleague asks if there is any mention of the report on the public Journal? For answering his inquiry the Clerk is examining the Journal. There is, therefore, a question before the House; and any member has a right to require that the Journal be examined to determine his mind on any particular business.

Mr. GRISWOLD was sorry to see a difference between the Speaker, and the gentleman from Virginia. The Speaker says there is no question before the House—the gentleman from Virginia says there is. It was very well for any gentleman requiring information contained in the Journal to inquire of the Clerk. But he never knew before that that made a motion.

Mr. LYON saw no difference between the Speaker and the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk said there was no mention on the public Journal of the report.

Mr. LYON moved that the doors be closed for the purpose of taking off the injunction of secrecy.

Mr. RODNEY was opposed to closing the doors. It might be proper to publish the report, but that could be directed at a future day. He felt very hostile to closing the doors of that House except on important occasions.

The question was taken on Mr. LYON's motion, which was lost—ayes 49, noes 62.

Mr. DAWSON wished, as the injunction of secrecy could not be taken off with open doors, that they would be shut for that purpose, when he should move a resolution for taking off the injunction on all subjects before us at the last session.

The SPEAKER said the regular course would be to move a reconsideration of the motion for closing the doors.

Mr. SMILIE hoped the House would reconsider the motion. He was no friend to shut doors; but it was apparent that the only way of giving publicity to the report was to come to a resolution to that effect with closed doors.

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

After some further remarks, the question of reconsideration was taken and agreed to; as also was the question for closing the doors.

The doors were then closed for a short time, and the injunction of secrecy respecting the report of the secret committee taken off, and the report ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, October 24.

THE LOUISIANA TREATY.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the treaty between the French Republic and Spain, of the first of October, one thousand eight hundred, together with a copy of the deed of cession from Spain, executed in pursuance of the same treaty, conveying Louisiana to France, (if any such deed exists;) also copies of such correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government or Minister of Spain, (if any such correspondence has taken place,) as will show the assent or dissent of Spain to the purchase of Louisiana by the United States; together with copies of such other documents as may be in the Department of State, or any other Department of this Government, tending to ascertain whether the United States have, in fact, acquired any title to the province of Louisiana by the treaties with France, of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three.

Mr. GRISWOLD said that, by adverting to the Message of the President respecting the treaty and conventions lately concluded between the United States and the French Government, he found that the President, speaking on the subject, observes: "As permanent arrangements for this object require time and deliberation, it is for your consideration whether you will not forthwith make such temporary provisions for the preservation, in the mean while, of order and tranquillity in the country, as the case may require." He recommends to the immediate attention of Congress the passage of some temporary laws. This being the case, and the subject being about to be brought before the House, it became important that they should know distinctly what they had obtained by the treaty; and whether there were any territory belonging to the United States to take possession of, or any new subjects to govern. Inasmuch as if no new territory or subjects were acquired, it was perfectly idle to pass even temporary laws for the occupation of the one, or the government of the other. He believed it would be admitted that, by the express terms of the treaty, the United States had neither acquired new territory nor new subjects. The part of the treaty having relation to this point, is thus expressed :

"Whereas by the article the third of the treaty concluded at St. Ildefonso, the 9th Vendemiaire, an 9 (1st October, 1800,) between the First Consul of the French Republic and His Catholic Majesty, it was agreed as follows :

"His Catholic Majesty promises and engages on his part, to cede to the French Republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein relative to his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it; and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States; and whereas, in pursuance of the treaty, and particularly of the third article, the French Republic has an incontestable title to the domain and to the possession of the said territory; the First Consul of the French Republic, desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the said United States, in the name of of the French Republic, forever, and in full sovereignty, the said territory, with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner as they have been acquired by the French Republic, in virtue of the above-mentioned treaty concluded with His Catholic Majesty."

By this article it appears, that in a treaty between Spain and France, Spain stipulated to cede to France, upon certain conditions, the province of Louisiana. The treaty between the United States and the French Government does not ascertain whether these terms have been complied with by France, or whether the cession has been actually made by Spain to France. All that appears is a promise made by Spain to cede. If the terms stipulated by France have not been complied with, and Spain has not delivered the province to France, then it results that France had no title, and of consequence that the United States has acquired no title from France. If this be correct, the consequence will be that we have acquired no new territory or new subjects, and that it is perfectly idle to spend time in passing laws for possessing the territory, and governing the people. This point not being ascertained by the language of the treaty, it may be important to obtain documents that may satisfy the House whether the United States have acquired either new territory or new subjects. In the treaty lately concluded with France, the treaty between France and Spain is referred to; only a part of it is copied. The treaty referred to must be a public treaty. In the nature of things it must be the title-deed for the province of Louisiana. The Government must have a copy of it. As there is but a part recited, it is evidently imperfect. It becomes therefore necessary to be furnished with the whole, in order to ascertain the conditions relative to the Duke of Parma; it also becomes necessary to get the deed of cession; for the promise to cede is no cession. This deed of cession, Mr. G. also presumed, was in the possession of Government. It was also important to know under what circumstances Louisiana is to be taken possession of, and whether with the consent of Spain, as she is still possessed of it. If it is to be taken possession of with her consent, the possession will be peaceable and one kind of provision will be necessary; but if it is to be taken possession of in opposition to Spain, a different provision may be necessary. From these considerations he thought it proper in the House to call upon the Executive for information on this point. Other important documents may, perhaps, likewise be in the hands of the President. Hence he considered it his duty, before the House went into a consideration of the resolutions laid on the table, to submit the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the treaty between the French Republic and Spain, of the first of October 1800, together with a copy of the deed of cession from Spain, executed in pursuance of the same treaty, conveying Louisiana to France, (if any such deed exists;) also copies of such correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government or Minister of Spain (if any such correspondence has taken place) as will show the assent or dissent of Spain to the purchase of Louisiana by the United States; together with copies of such other documents as may be in the departments of this Government, tending to ascertain whether the United States have, in fact, acquired any title to the province of Louisiana by the treaties with France, of the 30th of April 1803.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the resolution would not be agreed to. He was well apprized of the aspect which it was in the power of ingenuity to give to a refusal, on the part of that House, to require any information which gentlemen might think fit to demand of the Executive, however remotely connected with subjects before them. But the dread of imputations which he knew to be groundless should never induce him to swerve from that line of conduct which his most sober judgment approved. Did he indeed conceive that the nation, or the House, entertained a doubt of our having acquired new territory and people to govern; could he for a moment believe that even a minority, respectable as to numbers, required any other evidence of this fact than the extract from the treaty which had just been read, he would readily concur with the gentleman from Connecticut in asking of the Executive, whether indeed we had a new accession of territory and of citizens, or, as that gentleman had been pleased to express himself, subjects to govern. He hoped the gentleman would excuse a small variation from his own phraseology, since, notwithstanding the predilection which some Governments and some gentlemen manifested for this form, Mr. R. asked for himself the use of such as were more familiar to American ears and American constitutions.

The Executive has laid before this House an instrument, which he tells us has been duly ratified, conveying to the United States the country known under the appellation of Louisiana. The first article affirms the right of France, to the sovereignty of this territory, to be derived under the Treaty of St. Idefonso, which it quotes. The third article makes provision for the future government, by the United States, of its inhabitants; and the fourth provides the manner in which this territory and these inhabitants are to be transferred by France to us. There has been negotiated a convention, between us and the French Republic, stating, in the most unequivocal terms, that there does exist on her part a right to the country in question, which is supported by the strongest possible evidence, and pledging herself to put us in possession of that right, so soon as we shall have performed those stipulations, on our part, in consideration of which France has conveyed to us her sovereignty over this country and people. From the nature of our Government, these stipulations can only be fulfilled by laws to the passing of which the Legislature alone is competent. And when these laws are about to be passed, endeavors are made to impede, or frustrate, the measure, by setting on foot inquiries which mean nothing, or are unconnected with the subject, and this is done by those who have always contended that there was no discretion vested in this House by the Constitution, as to carrying treaties into effect. If, sir, gentlemen believe that we must eventually do that which rests with us, towards effecting this object, to what purpose is this inquiry? Mr. R. begged the House not to impute to him any disposition to countenance this monstrous doctrine, whose advocates now found it so difficult to practise. On the contrary, he held in the highest veneration the principle established in the case of the British Treaty, and the men by whom it was established, that, in all matters requiring legislative aid, it was the right and duty of this House to deliberate, and upon such deliberation, to afford, or refuse, that aid, as in their judgments the public good might require. And he held it to be equally the right of the House to demand such information from the Executive, as to them appeared necessary to enable them to form a sound conclusion on subjects submitted, by that Department, to their consideration. But those who then contended that this House possessed no discretion on the subject, that they were bound implicitly to conform to the stipulations, however odious and extravagant, into which the treaty-making power might have plunged the nation—those who then said that we cannot deliberate, are now instituting inquiries to serve as the basis of deliberation—(for if we are not to deliberate upon the result, why institute any inquiry at all?)—inquiries, which are in their very nature deliberation itself. But whilst he arraigned the consistency of other gentlemen, Mr. R. said that it behooved him to assert his own. Information on subjects of the nature of that which they were then discussing, might be required for two objects: to enable the House to determine whether it were expedient to approve a measure which on the face of it carried proof of its impolicy; or to punish Ministers who may have departed from their instructions—who may have betrayed the interests confided by the nation to their care.

To illustrate this remark, let us advert to the case of the Treaty of London, generally known as Mr. Jay's treaty. That instrument had excited the public abhorrence. The objections to carrying it into effect were believed insuperable. This sentiment pervaded the House of Representatives, and when they demanded information from the Executive, they virtually held this language: "Sir, we detest your treaty—we feel an almost invincible repugnance to giving it our sanction—but if, by the exhibition of any information in possession of the Executive, we can be convinced that the interests of the United States have been supported to the utmost extent;—that, wretched as this instrument is, the terms are as good as were attainable; and that, bad as those terms are, it is politic under existing circumstances to accept them, we will, however reluctantly, pass the laws for carrying it into effect. The present case, if he understood anything of the general sentiment, was, happily, of a different nature. The treaty which they were then called upon to sanction, had been hailed by the acclamations of the nation. It was not difficult to foresee, from the opinions manifested in every quarter, that it would receive the cordial approbation of a triumphant majority of that House. If such be the general opinion—if we are not barely satisfied with the terms of this treaty, but lost in astonishment at the all-important benefits which we have so cheaply acquired, to what purpose do we ask information respecting the detail of the negotiation? Has any one ventured to hint disapprobation of the conduct of the Ministers who have effected this negotiation? Has any one insinuated that our interests have been betrayed? If, then, we are satisfied as to the terms of this treaty, and with the conduct of our Ministers abroad, let us pass the laws necessary for carrying it into effect. To refuse—to delay, upon the plea now offered, is to jeopardize the best interests of the Union. Shall we take exception to our own title? Shall we refuse the offered possession? Shall this refusal proceed from those who so lately affirmed that we ought to pursue this very object at every national hazard? I should rather suppose the eagerness of gentlemen would be ready to outstrip the forms of law in making themselves masters of this country, than that, now, when it is offered to our grasp, they should display an unwillingness, or at least an indifference, for that which so lately was all-important to them. After the message which the President has sent us, to demand, if indeed we have acquired any new subjects, as the gentleman expresses it, which renders the exercise of our legislative functions necessary, would be nothing less than a mockery of him, of this solemn business, and of ourselves. Cautionary provisions may be introduced into the laws for securing us against every hazard, although, from the nature of our stipulations, we are exposed to none. We retain in our own hands the consideration money, even after we have possession.

Mr. R. expressed himself averse to demand the Spanish correspondence. The reasons must be obvious to all. The possession of Louisiana by us, will necessarily give rise to negotiations between the United States and Spain, relative to its boundaries. These have probably commenced, and are now pending. He hoped, therefore, the House would go into committee on the Message of the President, and after resolving to pass the requisite laws, if further information shall be wanting in relation to the mode of taking possession, or any other object of detail, the Executive might be called upon to furnish it.

Mr. LYON said he might have agreed to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, had he brought it forward in a respectful manner. But the terms of the motion imply that the Executive has made a bargain for that, to which we have no right. He wished the gentleman would give a little of that confidence which he had been in the habit of giving so liberally on former occasions. For his part, he was willing to see all the papers. He had no doubt of obtaining possession of Louisiana; and that gentlemen might have seen the order of the Spanish Government to surrender the province to the French.

Mr. LYON concluded by saying he had only risen to express his sense of the indecency of the motion.

Mr. GODDARD did not intend to enter upon a long discussion of the resolution; but it seemed to him that the reasons of the gentleman from Virginia for opposing it were very erroneous. On what ground was the opposition made? Altogether on the ground that Spain had actually made the cession to France. Mr. G. apprehended no such impression had been made on the House by the information before them. In the first article of the treaty they learned what the title of France was. The treaty says,

"Whereas, by the article the 3d of the treaty concluded at St. Ildefonso, the 9th Vendemiaire, an 9 (1st October, 1800,) between the First Consul of the French Republic and His Catholic Majesty, it was agreed as follows:

"His Catholic Majesty promises and engages on his part, to cede to the French Republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations therein relative to his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony of province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it; and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States.

"And whereas, in pursuance of the treaty, and particularly of the third article, the French Republic has an incontestable title to the domain and to the possession of the said territory; the First Consul of the French Republic, desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the said United States, in the name of the French Republic, for ever and in full sovereignty, the said territory, with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner as they have been acquired by the French Republic in virtue of the above-mentioned treaty, concluded with His Catholic Majesty.

Mr. GODDARD asked whether the conclusion followed that France had an incontestable title to Louisiana? There was no such evidence. If in virtue of this treaty we purchase a promise on the part of His Catholic Majesty to cede, and not an incontestable title, he would ask if the promise constituted a title? France only says, we cede all our title. This, and this only, is the language of the instrument. If this is the case, is it not proper to inquire whether there are other acts by which Spain has ceded Louisiana to France? Such acts may exist. Certain stipulations were made by France to Spain, on which the cession depended. Do we not then wish to know whether these stipulations have been fulfilled and whether they are binding, or whether Spain has waived them? Are there in existence any documents to that effect? It has been hinted that such documents exist in the newspapers; but are we in an affair of this magnitude to be referred to the dictum of a newspaper? He apprehended that this was a novel mode of legislation.

The gentleman from Virginia says that the 4th article of the treaty stipulates for the delivery of the country. That article is to this effect:

"There shall be sent by the Government of France a Commissary to Louisiana, to the end that he do every act necessary, as well to receive from the officers of His Catholic Majesty the said country and its dependencies, in the name of the French Republic, if it has not been already done, as to transmit it in the name of the French Republic to the Commissary or Agent of the United States."

Now, what is the Commissary to do? He is, in the first instance, to receive the province from Spain. Can he transmit it to the United States before he receives it from Spain? We require to know, if Spain refuses to deliver Louisiana to France, can France transmit it to us? We desire to know whether there is any prospect of a refusal on the part of Spain.

Suppose we shall receive the colony from France, under the dictation of the First Consul to Spain, without experiencing any opposition from her. May not the time arrive, on a revolution in the affairs of Europe, when she will inquire by what title we hold it? Is it not proper then for us to obtain papers, by which our title may be fully understood?

One singular argument is used by the gentleman from Virginia. This treaty, he says, is hailed by the acclamations of the country. But Mr. GODDARD would ask if the public had any opportunity of examining it, and being fully acquainted with its principles and probable operation? It had been made public only within a few days. What evidence of popular affection for it can there yet have been manifested? Will people hail it with acclamation when they shall learn that it gives fifteen millions of dollars for a mere promise. At any rate, as all agree in the importance of the subject, and as we are all called upon to legislate upon it, is it not proper first to obtain all the necessary information that is to be had? The resolution goes this far, and no farther, and if gentlemen claim our confidence, ought they not to furnish us with information?

Mr. SMILIE remembered that a subject of this nature had been brought before the House, in the first session of the fourth Congress. He thought it proper to recur to the proceedings on that occasion, to learn the sentiments entertained at that day. At that day, it had been argued by certain gentlemen that the right of passing or not passing the necessary laws for carrying a treaty into effect did not belong to that House, but that they were under an absolute obligation to pass them; that they had no discretion on the subject. This was a doctrine which he did not believe true. He then believed that they possessed the right, and still entertained the same opinion. To show the sentiments entertained in the case of the British Treaty, he would recur to the Journal of the House.

On the 24th of March, 1796, the following motion was made:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions to the Minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, (communicated by his Message of the first instant,) together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed."

This resolution was carried in the affirmative by ayes and noes, and among the noes I observe, said Mr. S., the name of the mover of this resolution. The resolution was carried by a large majority, and sent to the President. What was his opinion? Not that I approve it, or am governed by it; though it ought, in my opinion, to be a rule on this occasion to those who coincided with him. On the 30th of March, the PRESIDENT communicated the following Message to the House:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

"With the utmost attention I have considered your resolution of the twenty-fourth instant, requesting me to lay before your House a copy of the instructions to the Minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to that treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed. In deliberating upon this subject, it was impossible for me to lose sight of the principle which some have avowed in its discussion, or to avoid extending my views to the consequences which must flow from the admission of that principle.

"I trust that no part of my conduct has ever indicated a disposition to withhold any information which the Constitution has enjoined upon the President as a duty to give, or which could be required of him by either House of Congress as a right; and with truth I affirm that it has been, as it will continue to be, while I have the honor to preside in the Government, my constant endeavor to harmonize with the other branches thereof, so far as the trust delegated to me by the people of the United States, and my sense of the obligation it imposes to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution will permit.

"The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion, a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions, which may have been proposed or contemplated, would be extremely impolitic: for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences—perhaps danger and mischief in relation to other Powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate—the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand, and to have as a matter of course, all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign Power, would be to establish a dangerous precedent.

"It does not occur that the inspection of the papers asked for can be relative to any purpose under the cognizance of the House of Representatives, except that of an impeachment, which the resolution has not expressed. I repeat, that I have no disposition to withhold any information which the duty of my station will permit, or the public good shall require to be disclosed; and, in fact, all the papers affecting the negotiation with Great Britain were laid before the Senate, when the treaty itself was communicated for their consideration and advice.

"The course which the debate has taken, on the resolution of the House, leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties under the Constitution of the United States.

"Having been a member of the General Convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion, that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided that two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated, thenceforward becomes the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and, in all the treaties made with them, we have declared and they have believed that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they become obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution, every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced; and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for, till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

"There is also reason to believe that this construction agrees with the opinions entertained by the State conventions, when they were deliberating on the Constitution—especially by those who objected to it—because there was not required, in commercial treaties, the consent of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate, instead of two-thirds of the Senators present; and because, in treaties respecting territorial and certain other rights and claims, the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively, was not made necessary, is a fact declared by the General Convention, and universally understood, that the Constitution of the United States was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession. And it is well known that under this influence the smaller States were admitted to an equal representation in the Senate with the larger States, and that this branch of the Government was invested with great powers; for, on the equal participation of those powers the sovereignty and political safety of the smaller States were deemed essentially to depend.

"If other proofs than these, and the plain letter of the Constitution itself, be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the General Convention, which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those journals it will appear that a proposition was made, that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law, and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

"As therefore it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring Legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government, that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution, between the different departments, should be preserved; a just regard to the Constitution, and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request. GEO. WASHINGTON.

"UNITED STATES, March 30, 1796."

Mr. SMILIE concluded by saying he perceived no necessity for the papers desired by gentlemen, and should therefore vote against the motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, if the gentleman from Connecticut would confine his motion to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, he should be ready to acquiesce in it, though he did not believe that instrument would throw any new light on the subject.

Mr. GREGG said his wish was that the resolution should be divided, and that the Treaty of St. Ildefonso only should be requested. It had been conceded that it might be of some use in ascertaining the limits of the cession. To the other members of the resolution he was opposed. He therefore moved a division of the question.

Mr. GRISWOLD remarked that it would be more orderly to move the striking out the last paragraph.

Mr. SANFORD did not rise to say, with his colleague, (Mr. LYON,) that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Connecticut was indecent, but to say that, in his opinion, it was altogether unnecessary. It appeared to be a fact, well understood in the United States, that Louisiana did, before the late convention, belong to France. The fact was recognised in the treaty. If this fact be acknowledged, what remains for us to do, but to pass the necessary laws for carrying into operation the convention concluded on the 30th of April? Though there might be no official information to that effect, he was correct in saying possession of the country had been given to France by Spain. What then can be necessary on our part to obtain possession, other than the passage of the necessary laws to carry the treaty into effect?

Mr. ELLIOTT was opposed to every part of the call on the Executive for papers. He had a variety of objections to this request, with the mention of all of which he should not, however, trouble the House. His great objection was, that the call was premature, and this appeared—in his opinion, clearly appeared—even from the showing of the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) and his honorable colleague, (Mr. GODDARD.) To their brilliant talents he was disposed to give the highest homage. The first gentleman was not only ingenious and indefatigable, but likewise thoughtful and profound. He had already been frequently delighted with his eloquence, and instructed by his intelligence. The remarks also of his colleague were ingenious, and worthy of attention. But still he thought them premature. For what purpose was this call made? The gentleman says his attention is called to the subject by the President informing us in his Message that it is necessary to pass temporary laws, and that thence it becomes desirable to learn whether we have acquired either new territory or new subjects. Mr. E. was clearly of opinion that as yet we had not, though in a short time, if the treaty were carried into effect, we shall acquire them. The difficulties stated by the gentleman, the least investigation will show to be imaginary. Young as I am, said Mr. E., and little conversant in diplomatic knowledge, I believe the views I shall exhibit will be as clear as those of that gentleman. The Message of the President, at the opening of the session, announces that "the enlightened Government of France saw, with just discernment, the importance to both nations of such liberal arrangements as might best and permanently promote the peace, friendship, and interests of both: and the property and sovereignty of Louisiana, which had been restored to them, has, on certain conditions, been transferred to the United States by instruments bearing date the 20th of April." The President then informs us, that, when these shall have received the Constitutional sanction of the Senate, they will, without delay, be communicated to the Representatives also, for the exercise of their functions, as to those conditions which are within the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress." The Message goes further, and informs us—not in the phraseology of the gentleman from Connecticut, that we have acquired new subjects, but—that if the treaty shall receive the Constitutional sanction of the Senate and House of Representatives, we shall gain an acquisition, not of subjects, but of citizens. "With the wisdom of Congress, says the President, it will rest to take those ulterior measures which may be necessary for the immediate occupation and temporary government of the country; for its incorporation into our Union; for rendering the change of Government a blessing to our newly adopted brethren."

H. OF R.

The Louisiana Treaty.

Whether we acquire this territory and these citizens is consequential on the Constitutional ratification of the treaty.

But it is said that our title to Louisiana is deducible from the first article of the treaty, and that that article only contains a promise: and it is triumphantly asked whether the people of the United States will be satisfied with paying fifteen millions for a mere promise [Mr. ELLIOT here quoted the first article of the treaty.] I acknowledge, said he, that this is only an assertion of France of her incontestable title, and an assurance that on certain terms she will convey this title to the United States. But, according to the treaty and convention, an agent is to be appointed by France, who is to deliver up the possession before we pay the fifteen millions. But, say gentlemen, though this may be done, Spain may not abandon her title to the province. No such consequence, however, can result. The convention that follows the treaty contains a stipulation, that the stock created shall not be delivered until "after Louisiana shall be taken possession of in the name of the Government of the United States." So that, taking the treaty and the convention together, there can result none of the inconveniences apprehended. A treaty has been made between the First Consul and the United States, by which the First Consul has transferred to us the domain and jurisdiction of Louisiana. In the treaty it is stipulated that a commissary shall be sent to receive the country from the Court of Madrid and give us the possession. If these two articles be carried into effect, and they must be to make the treaty binding, we must obtain not only the actual but also the legal possession. It is incumbent, therefore, on us to do everything necessary on our part to realize the possession.

Mr. THATCHER said, though the gentleman who had just sat down had acquitted himself handsomely, he had neither convinced him that the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut was ill-founded or unnecessary. As they were, in the capacity of a legislative body, called upon to pass laws for new territory and new citizens, it was, according to his understanding, necessary, in the first instance, to learn that they had acquired new territory and new citizens. The title to Louisiana, as derived to France from Spain, was stated in the first article of the treaty. [Here Mr. T. read the first article.] By this it appears that another treaty had been formed between France and Spain. It was admitted that the province had belonged to Spain; and to her it must still belong, unless France has performed certain stipulations agreed to as the price of the cession. The object of the mover is to obtain this treaty, and to learn whether France has performed these stipulations.

Gentlemen objecting to this resolution, have taken different grounds. Some oppose it as inconsistent with the sentiments that prevailed in the case of the British Treaty; others, because it is premature, and others, because it is unnecessary. He did not expect the first objection from any member on that floor; much less did he expect it from the quarter in which it originated. The advocates of the motion were charged with inconsistency. He was not a member of the House at the time of the British Treaty, but, on referring to the Journal, it would be perceived that the object of gentlemen who then called for papers was to go into the merits of the British Treaty. It would not be denied that the ground then taken by gentlemen on the other side was, that the House had a right to examine the merits of the treaty, and to the assertion of that right it was that the President answered. We now say that it is not necessary for us to act in our legislative capacity, intending, if it shall appear to be necessary, not to withhold acting. Mr. T. therefore conceived that they exhibited no inconsistency, as they did not purpose at this time to go into the merits of the treaty, and as they acknowledged the treaty, if constitutionally made, to be binding. But they wanted information on subjects of legislation.

It has been said that the newspapers inform us of the order of Spain to deliver Louisiana to France. But they were not to be guided by newspaper accounts. We desire to know from an authentic source whether the stipulations entered into by France have been executed. By the first article of the treaty it appears that "His Catholic-

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

‘ Majesty promises and engages on his part, to cede to the French Republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein, relative to his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it; and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States.’ This article goes to say that Spain may have altered the boundaries of Louisiana differently from what they were when France before possessed it. And for what we know, she has done so. Hence the importance of seeing the papers asked for. If we obtain the bare possession, it is one thing; the legal possession is another thing. It is one thing to govern the colony with a corps of civilians, and another and a different thing to govern it with an army. The President may, perhaps, have considered it a good bargain to obtain, for the payment of fifteen millions, the mere quitclaim of France to the province. At any rate it is proper that we should act with our eyes open; and, therefore, the importance of having a copy of the treaty entered into between the Governments of Spain and France, or evidence that Spain has acquiesced in the cession to the United States.

Mr. NICHOLSON was extremely glad to find that gentlemen on the other side of the House had at length abandoned the ground which they had taken some years ago. He was rejoiced that they were now willing to acknowledge, what they had heretofore most strenuously denied, that the House of Representatives had a Constitutional right, not only to call for papers, but to use their discretion in carrying any treaty into effect. That it must now be their impression was evident, or their conduct was surely unaccountable. Why else do they call for papers, why inquire into our title to the province of Louisiana? If the doctrine of a former day was still to be adhered to, why urge this inquiry? If gentlemen are consistent with themselves, if they have not forgot the lessons which they inculcated upon the ratification of the British Treaty, this House has no right to call for papers, no right to make inquiry, no right to deliberate, but must carry this treaty into effect, be it good or bad; must vote for all the necessary measures, whether they are calculated to promote the interests of the United States or not. The doctrines of old times, however, are now given up, the ground formerly taken is abandoned. We shall no longer hear that the Executive is omnipotent, and that the Representatives of the people are bound to vote, blindfolded, for carrying into effect all treaties which the President and the Senate may think proper to make and ratify. He thanked the gentlemen for the admission, and hoped that the country would profit by it hereafter.

He was happy to say that this was not now, nor ever was, the doctrine of himself and his friends. They meant to deliberate, they meant to use their discretion in voting away the treasure of the nation. He agreed with gentlemen, that if a majority of the House entertained any doubt as to the validity of the title we have acquired, they ought to call for papers; and he had no doubt, if there was any dissatisfaction, they would call. He himself should have no objection to vote for the resolution if it was confined to proper objects, not indeed to satisfy himself, for he was already fully satisfied, but to satisfy other gentlemen; to satisfy the American people, that the insinuations thrown out about the title, are totally without foundation. The resolution in its present shape, however, was highly improper; it looked to extrinsic circumstances, and contemplated an inquiry into subjects totally unconnected with the treaty with France. What, said Mr. N., has Spain to do in this business? Gentlemen ask if she has acquiesced in our purchase, and call for her correspondence with our Government. What is the acquiescence of Spain to us? If the House is satisfied from the information laid on the table, that Spain had ceded Louisiana to France, and that France had since ceded it to the United States, what more do they require? Are we not an independent nation? Have we not a right to make treaties for ourselves without asking leave of Spain? What is it to us whether she acquiesces or not? She is no party to the treaty of cession, she has no claim to the ceded territory. Are we to pause till Spain thinks proper to consent, or are we to inquire, whether, like a cross child, she has thrown away her rattle, and cries for it afterwards?

The treaty itself, he said, and the conventions attached to it, furnished all the necessary information. By reference to the treaty it would be found, that Louisiana is ceded to the United States with the same boundaries that it had before been ceded with by Spain to France; and that France had obliged herself to send a commissary to New Orleans to receive the possession from Spain and to transfer it to us. For this the United States were to pay fifteen millions of dollars to the French Government. But how, and when? Not immediately; not till we had actually acquired the possession. And if France shall fail to put us into actual possession, the United States are not bound to pay a single dollar. So that the call for papers can be of no possible use. Suppose these papers should show that Spain had not acquiesced, what is this to us? Is her pleasure to be a law to the United States!

With regard to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, Mr. N. said, he should have no objection to its being laid before the House, if it was in the possession of the Executive. In all probability, however, this was not the case, as it was known to be a secret treaty on other subjects of great importance between France and Spain. As to the deed of cession spoken of, he really did not understand what was meant, for he imagined it was not expected a formal deed of bargain and sale had been executed between two civilized nations, who negotiated by means of ambassadors. If there were any other papers which could give gentlemen more information, he had no objection, either, that these should be laid before them. Not indeed for his own satisfaction, but for that of those who were not already satisfied, if there were any of that description. One very important paper, he knew from high authority, was certainly in existence, and possibly might be in the power of the Executive. This was a formal order, under the royal signature of Spain, commanding the Spanish officers at Orleans to deliver the province to the French Prefect, which he considered equal, perhaps superior to any deed of cession; for it was equal to an express recognition on the part of Spain, that France had performed all the conditions referred to in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. It was an acknowledgment that Spain had no further claims upon Louisiana, and would show that any interference on her part ought to have no influence on the American Government.

H. OF R.

The Louisiana Treaty.

OCTOBER, 1803.

The call for the correspondence between the Government of Spain and that of the United States, if there was any such, he should not assent to, as it could be of no possible importance. The acquiescence or the refusal of Spain, could have no weight on the question, whether we should take possession or not. Any interference on her part would be idle and extravagant. We might as well ask, whether the cession had received the approbation of Great Britain, of Russia, or even of the Dey of Algiers himself, for they each had as good a right to interpose as Spain had, either of them having full as good a title to Louisiana. To those parts of the resolution which pointed at the object he had mentioned, he should have no objection, but he never would consent to call on the Executive to say, whether Spain, Great Britain, or any other nation, was satisfied with a treaty made between the United States and the French Government.

MR. MITCHILL said he rose to express his sentiments against the whole body of the resolution under debate. But his disinclination to adopt it did not arise from any doubt of the right which the House possessed to call upon the Executive for information. He had no hesitation to ask the President for papers whenever it was necessary to obtain them. And it was equally clear to him that whenever that dignified officer was properly applied to, he would comply cheerfully with the request of Congress, or of either branch of it. He owned that in some cases it would be the duty of the House to pursue this mode of inquiry, and equally would it be the duty of the head of the Executive department to give his aid and countenance.

In the present stage of the proceedings respecting the Treaty and Conventions with France concerning Louisiana, he deemed it improper to embarrass the business by an unseasonable call upon the Executive for papers. The President had already communicated various information on this subject, in his Message on the first day of the session. Additional information was given in his Message of the 21st, wherein he told the House that the ratification and exchanges had been made. This was accompanied with instruments of cession and covenant concluded at Paris between our Ministers and the agents of the French Republic. All this information we had already on our tables. This the President had put the House in possession of from his own sense of duty. This obligation was imposed on him by the Constitution, which declares that he shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. Mr. M. said he had a firm belief that the President had complied with this Constitutional injunction. He had communicated such intelligence as he had received; and if he was possessed of anything else needful for the deliberation of the House, he was willing to think the Chief Magistrate of the Union would have spontaneously imparted it.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Griswold) however says, that the cession expressed in the treaty, is no cession at all, but a mere pretence. He says that our title is derived from France, who has no title whatever to Louisiana, and of course can convey none to the United States. He differed in opinion with that gentleman entirely. The treaty contained internal evidence enough for him to act upon. And it was accompanied with extrinsic events and circumstances of great publicity. The united evidence of these we could not resist without rejecting all human testimony, and sinking into absolute scepticism.

Let us review, sir, what the sum of this information amounts to. By the first article of the treaty which has so lately been laid before us, we have a recital of that part of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, concluded October 1, 1800, whereby His Catholic Majesty promises and engages to cede to the French Republic the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States. Here is a promise to cede; but the stipulation is accompanied with a condition which, as is alleged by the mover of the resolution, has never been performed. This condition, though not expressed at large in the first article, is well understood to be the establishment of the Duke of Parma in the full and entire possession of Tuscany, and the making him a monarch, under the title of the King of Etruria. This has been done in the face of all Europe. And the deliberations in the Diet of Ratisbon, concerning German indemnities, shows that the Prince, who was turned out of that country to make room for a younger member of the blood royal of Spain, was one of those who suffered a loss of dominion and revenue when Italy was borne down by the victorious arms of France. Mr. M. said he would not enter into the detail of European politics, nor dwell upon the splendid campaigns which had been made beyond the Alps. He would only urge upon the attention of the House, that France had put the Duke of Parma on the throne of Etruria, and had thereby acquired a title to Louisiana. This was the consideration or price with which the American province was purchased from Spain. But the right of France to Louisiana does not rest here—it is not a nudum pactum—so far from it, effective measures have been adopted to carry it into operation by adding possession to right. A Commissioner has been sent to New Orleans, on the part of the French Republic, to receive the province of Louisiana from Spain. This officer has been received respectfully there. He has been officially recognised, and has had solemn induction and investiture. He may be considered as completely in possession, and enjoying, as far as the treaty requires, actual seizin of the country. If even possession by twig and turf was required, the French Republic really seemed to have been permitted by the Government of Spain to have such a possessory establishment. A title thus acquired, and accompanied by an allowed and peaceful possession, is about to be granted to the United States. The provisions to the completion of this object are stated in the fourth article of the treaty, which stipulates that there shall be sent by France a commissary to Louisiana, to the end that he do every act necessary, as well to receive from the officers of His Catholic Majesty the said country and its dependencies, in the name of the French Republic, if it has not been already done, as to transmit it in the name of the French Republic to the commissary or agent of the United States.

An objection had been raised on the ground of the uncertainty of the limits of Louisiana. He did not feel the force of this. In the ignorance in which the world was at present involved as to American geography, we should indeed receive it talis qualis, such as it was generally understood or usually reputed to be. He perfectly well knew it had been very little explored, and far less travelled over by surveyors with chain and compass. Uncertainty overhung the subject; but this would be dissipated by degrees, as the unknown regions should be visited and described. We might then proceed to adjust the limits in a manner similar to that we had repeatedly adopted with respect to the present territory of the United States. As Commissioners had been from time to time appointed to settle our boundaries on the Southern, Northeastern, and Northwestern frontiers, so might every geographical difficulty as to the extent of Louisiana be removed by Commissioners acting under like authority and powers.

Previously, however, to receiving the perfect transfer and possession on our part, it is necessary that we should make arrangements to pay for it. For although, by the second article of the first convention, it is agreed that no money or stock shall be advanced before Louisiana shall be taken possession of in the name of the Government of the United States; yet, as no money can be paid but by virtue of appropriations made by law, it is incumbent on Congress forthwith to declare whether they will make appropriation or not. If this appropriation is not made by law, there is an end of the treaty, and of all the expectations to which it has given rise. On the other hand, if duly and promptly made, our Government will be enabled, according to the promise contained in the fifth article, to receive from the commissary of the French Republic all the military posts of New Orleans and other parts of the ceded territory, and to see the troops of France and Spain, who may be there, withdraw from the country, and evacuate it. Mr. M. thought that Congress already possessed as much information as was requisite to act with wisdom and intelligence on the great question before them.

Acknowledging as he did the right of the House to request the President to give the copies of papers mentioned in the resolution under debate, his opposition to it arose merely from the persuasion he felt, that they were unnecessary, and some of them impossible to be had. Some papers were asked for, which he was confident did not exist in the hands of the President or anywhere else. It would be as agreeable to him, Mr. M. said, as to the mover of the resolution, to examine these papers as matters of rational curiosity, or as documents of authentic history. But now was not the time for these secondary researches, however amusing they might be. Graver subjects demanded our immediate attention, and there might be danger in delay. The operation of the resolution, if adopted, would certainly be to procrastinate and embarrass; and he did not discern what good would be wrought at that time by agreeing to it. There was an additional reason, and that a very weighty one, for refusing the motion at this time. By the treaty it must "be ratified in good and due form, and the ratifications exchanged within six months after execution." The date of this deed of cession is the 30th of April last; consequently the limited time would expire on the 30th of the current month. A doubt had been expressed by some gentlemen, for whose judgment he entertained the greatest respect, whether the ratification would be consummated in "good and due form," unless the declaration and act of this House should follow up the determination of the President and Senate. Mr. M. therefore concluded that, as there were but a few days left to decide on the question which involved the sovereignty of the Mississippi, and the adjacent country on both its banks, it would be better to proceed without delay to comply with all the pre-requisites. At a future day, he would have no objection to amuse his leisure with the perusal of the paper comprised in the resolution; but at present, he thought the members had neither inclination nor time to spare. Mr. M. therefore concluded by moving a postponement of the resolution until the 30th day of May next. The motion then being seconded,

Mr. FINDLEY said he was opposed to the postponement. He would rather face the resolution and decide upon it at once. If this House thinks it expedient, they will say so; if they think it inexpedient, they will manifest their opinion. He was one of those who considered the resolution as neither necessary nor expedient. It was not pretended that we yet had either territory or people to govern; but we were required to carry a treaty into effect that would give us both territory and people. Doubts had been suggested of the validity of our title; but shall doubts be put in competition with official papers? It was not, however, his intention to detain the House with a discussion of this point, on which sufficient had been already said; but to notice an allusion made to the proceedings of a former Congress. It was proper that they should be correctly understood. When he looked around him he did not see more than eight or ten members of the House at the time referred to. It had been said by a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) that the House in the case of the British Treaty claimed to decide on treaties. In answer to this observation, he begged leave to read the reply of the House to the Message of the President; first observing that the contest was respecting the discretion of the House not to agree to treaties, but to grant money for carrying them into effect. On that occasion it had been contended there was no such discretion. The following are the proceedings on that occasion:

"The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the President of the United States assigning the reasons which forbid his compliance with the resolution of this House of the 24th ultimo, requesting a copy of the instructions, correspondence, and other documents, relative to the treaty lately concluded between the United States and Great Britain; and after some time spent therein, Mr. Speaker resumed the chair and Mr. Muhlenberg reported that the Committee had, according to order, again had the said Message under consideration and come to two resolutions thereupon, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table where the same was read; as follows:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, 'That the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided that two-thirds of the Senators present concur: The House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the Constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

This resolution was carried by a majority of 57 to 35. From this statement it was evident that the point at that day in dispute was not whether the House had a right to ratify treaties, but whether they had a right to grant money; that is, whether they had not the same discretion on this as on other occasions? Mr. FINLEY concluded by observing that he was himself prepared, with the information before them, to carry the present treaty into effect.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD scarcely believed the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) serious in his motion to postpone this resolution. If it ever was proper to decide it, it was certainly proper to decide it now. If ever the information requested was wanted, it was for the purpose of legislating correctly on the subject of the Message. If it is not wanted, the House will not hesitate to negative the resolution. In my judgment, said Mr. G., it is wanted for the purpose of legislating correctly on those subjects that are before us. I am one of those who do now believe, and always have believed, that the exclusive right of forming treaties resides in the President and Senate; and that when ratified, it is the duty of every department of the Government to carry them into effect. This treaty then, if fairly and constitutionally made, is a law of the land, and we are bound to execute it. But it is necessary to know its nature and effects to carry it into execution. If it is a mere dead letter, there is no necessity for any laws whatever. Hence the necessity of knowing precisely its nature and effects, before we are able to pass the necessary laws for carrying it into effect. Gentlemen will not deny this. If the treaty itself is in these respects uncertain, they will admit the necessity of having recourse to other documents to decide what we are to do to carry it into effect. In my judgment the treaty is uncertain. I am not able to say from the light it supplies, whether we acquire by it new territory or subjects, or if the gentleman from Virginia pleases, new citizens; though I have always understood that all persons living under every description of Governments were bound to obey it, and of course were subjects, and that the term was as applicable to a Republic as to a Monarchy. Will gentlemen say that it is not necessary to ascertain the nature and effects of this treaty, in order to legislate correctly respecting it? What does the President say in his Message? He says, "It is for your consideration whether you will not forthwith make such temporary provisions for the preservation, in the meanwhile, of order and tranquillity in the country as the case may require." He calls upon us forthwith to legislate. If we have acquired the country and people, it is certainly proper to pass laws for the preservation of order and tranquillity; but if we have acquired neither, whence the necessity of passing such laws? It would be improper; it would be usurpation. We contend that the treaty does not ascertain these points; gentlemen differ from us in opinion. But I beg them calmly and seriously to attend to its language. By the first article it appears that Spain promised to cede Louisiana to France on certain stipulations. She promises to cede. Gentlemen cannot mistake the import of the language; it is a promise, not a cession. Will it be said that France acquired any title by this promise? This cannot be contended; the treaty does not declare whether the terms stipulated by France have been complied with, or whether the cession was actually made. The terms of the treaty are "whereas, in pursuance of the treaty, and particularly of the third article, the French Republic has an incontestable title," &c. Will gentlemen say that this assertion on the part of France gives her a title? It gives her no title. An assertion by France cannot affect Spain.

But, say gentlemen, France has stipulated the sending a commissary to receive Louisiana from Spain, and transmit it to us. What is the amount of this engagement? It is an engagement to receive and transmit. But suppose France does not send the commissary, or Spain refuses to deliver the country. If gentlemen are correct in the construction they give to the first article, to wit: that we have acquired a good title, will not the House hold the language of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) and say, "what do we care for Spain?" I therefore consider the fourth article as amounting to nothing. This consideration enforces the motion I have had the honor to submit; because if it shall turn out that we have acquired a good title, and the treaty shall appear to be fairly and Constitutionally made and ratified, we have a right in virtue of every principle of the law of nations to enforce our title.

The President has called upon us forthwith to pass laws for the preservation of order and tranquillity in this Territory. Should we not then seriously inquire into the validity of our title? for we have no right to exercise jurisdiction over it if our title is not rightful. Suppose France had ceded to us the Island of Great Britain. Would the mere cession give us the right to the soil and jurisdiction of that country? Before we pass the laws that are alleged to be necessary, we ought to ascertain whether the people of Louisiana owe us allegiance as their rightful sovereigns.

Gentlemen say, though they are content to call for the Treaty of Ildefonso, there are other parts of the resolution to which they cannot assent, and particularly that which relates to Spain. In one view this information is important. If it shows the consent of Spain to the cession to us, it is equivalent to an abandonment, so far as relates to us, of the stipulations made to her by France, and all that remains for us to do is to organize a government over the people of that Territory. But if Spain refuse her consent, and remains in possession—and I always understood till this day that she does remain in possession—it may be necessary to resort to other measures. For that purpose I have thought it proper to call for papers that may ascertain the disposition of Spain. As to the expression "deed of cession," it may not, perhaps, be the most apt; and it will be perfectly agreeable to me to substitute the word "instrument," if that shall be more agreeable to gentlemen. I beg leave to add that with regard to all these documents, no doubt can be entertained of their being in the possession of the Executive. When realizing this important purchase, he certainly felt it important to know whether the nation selling had a right to sell; and that right must have depended upon the treaty of 1800. Let not gentleman ascribe to me the least wish to pry into the secrets of State. This measure cannot be fairly so construed. The Treaty of Ildefonso must be a public treaty from the nature of it. As to the correspondence with the Government of Spain, I should presume that that cannot be secret. But if the President will say that Spain has assented to or dissented from the treaty of cession, that will be sufficient for me. For these reasons I deem the adoption of the resolution at this time important, and that it is consequently improper to postpone it to a future day. I presume gentlemen are desirous to carry this treaty into effect without delay. I am not the least disposed to frustrate their wishes; and when these documents shall be received, if gentlemen permit them to be received, we shall be enabled immediately to decide whether the treaty calls for any particular laws to carry it into execution.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that when the gentleman from Connecticut introduced the resolution it struck him as being irregular, but as it had not received any animadversion from the Chair, and as he felt greatly disposed to favor the utmost latitude in debate, especially on the part of the other side of the House, he had offered no objection to the course which had been pursued; although it appeared to him that, this subject being in the possession of the Committee of the Whole House, it would have been more regular to have moved a previous discharge of that committee, or to have offered the resolution in that committee, by way of showing that it was not expedient to pass the necessary laws for carrying the treaty into effect. This was not the only case in which a question had been discussed on incidental points, rather than on its own merits. It had become almost habitual with the House to decide the principal questions before them, by debating others of a preliminary nature. He hoped therefore he should be excused in following the extensive but devious track of the gentlemen from Connecticut. He declared himself entirely at a loss how to reconcile the theory and practice of that gentleman. He confessed that he had rather have seen him come boldly forward and deny the propriety of carrying the treaty into effect, than fighting behind entrenchments which cramped his exertions, whilst they did not cover him from that charge of inconsistency against which he vainly endeavored to shield himself. Mr. R. regretted, therefore, that the gentleman had given any previous pledge which tended, at this time, to fetter his opposition to the treaty. He felt himself at a loss how to understand an expression which had been repeatedly and emphatically used—"if the treaty were constitutionally ratified." The Executive informs us that this instrument has received the sanction of the Senate, and yet the scepticism of gentlemen is so extreme, that they cannot argue from the fact, but put the case hypothetically. Do they suppose the ratification to have been informal and incomplete?

Mr. GRISWOLD explained. He said he would merely inform the gentleman what he had thought and intended to express, viz: that if the treaty be constitutionally made and ratified, that House was bound to carry it into effect.

Mr. RANDOLPH continued—"If it be Constitutionally made and ratified?" Really, sir, this is the age of ingenious distinction. Unfortunately I am too dull to comprehend how a treaty can be constitutionally ratified, which is not constitutionally made. If, however, it be constitutionally made and ratified, the gentleman acknowledges himself bound to carry it into effect; and yet he wants documents. To prove, what? That the treaty is Constitutional? to clear up doubts of this nature? Not at all; not to decide whether we have a treaty which contravenes the provisions of the Constitution, but to determine whether we have any treaty at all. We must first see whether we have acquired territory and inhabitants to govern before we can pass the necessary laws giving effect to the treaty; although, by the gentlemen's own showing, we must pass the laws for carrying the treaty into effect, (provided they do not violate the Constitution,) even if it should be found that we have acquired neither territory nor inhabitants. According to the gentleman's doctrine, we must make good the stipulations into which the Executive may have entered, in the name of the nation, whether we have acquired anything in return or not. To what purpose then is this inquiry made? But we are told that inquiry is necessary to enable us to ascertain the proper mode of effecting the desired end; to determine whether (as a gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. THATCHER, has said) we shall march a body of soldiers, or civilians, to take possession of Louisiana. But was it necessary to determine the mode of taking possession, before they would resolve to take possession at all? If the House would previously decide this question—if they would come to a resolution that it was expedient to take possession, that resolution would be referred to a select committee to prepare a bill in conformity to it, and when that bill should be under their consideration, it would be proper to determine whether we would send soldiers, or civilians, to New Orleans. From the zeal which that gentleman and his friends had manifested on this subject, Mr. R. entertained no doubt of their willingness to serve in either capacity.

Gentlemen allow that they are bound to carry the treaty into effect, if consistent with the Constitution; but they say, that there may be, and are, dubious points, which must be cleared up, in order to enable them to understand how to carry it into effect. It would be strange indeed if there were not dubious expressions in this, as in almost all other treaties. For to what purpose are treaties generally made, but to define and settle the doubts of prior treaties, furnishing themselves matter for other negotiations, in an uninterrupted succession of cause and effect? Thus subsequent treaties have been made to settle the construction of the Treaty of Paris of 1783—and yet later conventions endeavor to destroy the ambiguity of these explanations. There never was a convention between nations to which this objection would not be urged. The Treaty of 1783 was so deficient in respect to the limits assigned the United States, that it could not be carried into execution, unless two straight lines can enclose space. This was the natural result of our then ignorance of the extent and direction of the great rivers and lakes, on the northeastern frontier. The treaty now before us may be presumed to be equally or more indefinite, as to the boundaries, than that of Paris—since the geography of the United States, at that time, was better understood than that of Louisiana is at this. But a new discovery is made. That whatever doubts may arise under the treaty in question, it belongs to the Executive to clear them up, and for that purpose this application is proposed to be made. Mr. R. said that he had always understood, till now, that doubts arising on any compact between independent Powers were the proper subject of negotiation between those Powers. That in this way alone they could be resolved, and not by one of the parties undertaking to put his own construction on the question. To what purpose then apply to the Executive for a solution of doubts to which both the parties interested alone are competent, and which it belongs not to one of them to decide?

It is said that the Treaty of St. Ildefonso would enable us to ascertain whether France had complied with the stipulations in consideration of which Louisiana was ceded to her by Spain, and that probably it defines the boundaries of that country. With respect to the first object, even if it were in the power of the Executive to furnish us with a copy of that instrument, we should only learn, what we already know, that France engaged to raise a younger son of the Spanish branch of the House of Bourbon to the Etrurian throne. Suppose, sir, we were officially apprized of this fact; would that satisfy the gentleman from Connecticut? By no means. Whilst there is a possibility of doubt, he has told us honestly, he does not mean to be satisfied. No sir; you must summon a venue to establish the fact that the Duke of Parma has been elevated to the rank of Tuscan King, and obtain a verdict in his favor, before you prevail on the cautious jealousy of that gentleman to assent to the proposition. In regard to the limits of the country in question, it is well known that neither in that of St. Ildefonso, nor any other treaty, have they been accurately defined. Nor ought this to be a matter of surprise, since neither the Treaty of Paris in 1783, nor that of London in 1794, has fixed the boundaries of the United States, and in consequence, our northwestern line was still unclosed. If gentlemen wanted information on this subject, instead of sending this resolution to the President, they should send their doorkeeper into the library for Du Pratz, and Chalmers, and Jenkinson. They will find more concerning the extent of Louisiana in Louis XIV's grant to Crozat than in the treaty which they require, or in any other. By the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, Spain "cedes to France the province of 'Louisiana, with the same extent it now has in the 'hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it; and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and 'other States.'" The only article then of this treaty which concerns us, is quoted in that which is now in our possession. To establish what was the extent of the country when France possessed it, will doubtless form—perhaps now forms—the subject of negotiation with Spain. If, then, the precision which the gentleman requires be insisted on, the assent of this House may be refused to the laws for carrying the treaty into effect, until a complete adjustment of our boundary shall have taken place with Spain; and inasmuch as this can never be effected until these laws are passed, and possession thereby taken of the country, the gentleman will obtain a perpetual virtual adjournment of this question. Availing himself of this newly discovered distinction, whilst he acknowledges an indispensable political obligation to carry treaties into effect, he may refuse his sanction to any particular treaty. It is only to discover some real or apparent obscurity, should no Constitutional objections present themselves, and the business is done. The gentleman thus surmounts, or gets around his own doctrine, and opposes a treaty as effectively as if he had never supported the position that this House was bound to execute them. But it requires all the intrepidity of the gentleman from Connecticut to assert his consistency. What do we now propose? Only to submit to the House the bare abstract proposition that it is expedient to pass the laws for carrying this treaty into effect. We propose no particular measure; no matter of detail is before us; we are not debating whether we shall employ soldiers or civilians; and yet the gentleman, while he acknowledges an obligation to carry treaties Constitutionally made, into effect, whilst he urges no Constitutional objection in this case, refuses his assent to the general position of the expediency of passing the laws necessary to give effect to the treaty in question, on the ground of difficulty, or hazard to the United States; in other words, on the ground of inexpediency. The House will perceive how greatly the gentleman must be embarrassed, when he is driven to such glaring inconsistency; when he is compelled to compound the question, whether the treaty ought to be carried into effect? with one entirely different; the manner in which that effect is to be attained?

The Louisiana Treaty.

But, says another gentlemen from the same quarter of the Union, to whose reputation for ingenuity, although it has been reputed by a gentleman from Vermont, Mr. R. could not subscribe, Spain may have a right which she dare not now assert, since she trembles at the nod of the First Consul, but which, hereafter, she may reclaim, and unless you procure her formal relinquishment of that right, you cannot stand on safe ground. Twenty years hence she may demand Louisiana at your hands, and wrest it from you, as it has been wrested from her, by force. Mr. R. said, that, with some variation of terms, this was the same monstrous opinion which had been urged against every proposition for peace between England and France: because at some undefined future period, events may take place which are beyond the control of human prudence, we are now called upon to act, not upon the existing state of things, but upon a possible future state of existence, which speculative minds have chosen to imagine. But how are we to reconcile this reluctant caution to the doctrine of forcible possession, so lately inculcated by gentlemen? At one time it was necessary to possess ourselves of the key of the Mississippi, on any terms, and in any way. There was no waiting to examine into the title of other nations, or scarcely into our own. The Mississippi must be had at every hazard, and in any mode. Now that it was offered to us, gentlemen can devise no mode of getting it. They are so embarrassed with forms, which sometime past were held as nothing, that the value of the Mississippi, which was held as everything, has sunk in their estimation. That Mississippi, for whose acquisition the nation was to be precipitated at once into war, is now of so little consequence that the most trivial form outweighs it in their estimation.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that he expected to have seen those gentlemen foremost in zeal for taking possession of the country in question, and so far from throwing impediments in the way, that in case Spain manifested any opposition to the step, they would have been the first to originate measures for compelling her assent. This would have been consistent. He treated the idea of future reclamation by Spain as futile in the extreme. If, however, gentlemen were disposed to examine into the question of the extent of Louisiana, instead of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, they must look elsewhere for its history—from the first settlement of La Salle to its surrender in 1736, to Spain and Great Britain. The only clause of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso which affects this subject, is now in the possession of the House. With them it rests to determine whether we will accept it, as there described, and upon the conditions stipulated. After we shall have resolved to accept it, it will be incumbent on every gentleman to devise the best means for securing our possession. At that stage of the subject, said Mr. R. it will be proper for gentlemen to descant upon the state of our relations with Spain, to demonstrate the danger of opposition from that quarter, and to devise the means of surmounting it. But on the plain abstract question, whether we would accept the country or not, all these observations were premature. He hoped, therefore, that having acquired Louisiana, as possessed by Spain, and as it was held by France, the House would pass the laws for enabling the Executive to give effect to the contract, and he should vote against the resolution, as tending to embarrass a question which he wished to see decided, and as lengthening a discussion which he hoped would be terminated before they rose.

Mr. GODDARD remarked that though the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had not pleased to compliment him on the score of ingenuity, yet he had replied copiously to his remarks; and this, he presumed, he would have spared himself the trouble of doing, had he not considered those remarks entitled to his notice. The gentleman asks, what has become of the hostile sentiments of his political friends? Mr. G. did not understand exactly to what he alluded. He and his political friends had seen the time when they thought the essential rights of their country invaded. Then it was that they were disposed by vigorous measures to assert them, and to them it was indifferent whether these rights were violated in Virginia or on the banks of the Mississippi. But where will it appear that they proposed to acquire Louisiana by force? Was it proposed during the last session to acquire this country by warlike measures? The project of acquiring that extensive territory by force or by other means was entirely novel. Did we then ever hear of passing the banks of the Mississippi? Did we then hear a proposition to acquire this vast territory by war? No gentleman had ever heard this. It may have been said, if our rights are invaded, it is our duty to put ourselves in a situation to defend them. But was that war? Let me then, said Mr. G., ask with what justice gentlemen charge us with having had a disposition to go to war with France or Spain? The war-whoop has been sounded, and we have been charged with wishing to embroil our country in war. But the charge is injurious. Then, and now, we feel disposed to repel the unjust aggressions of Spain and France on our rights. We then were in favor of vigorous measures to repel them, and we are still in favor of the same measures, should our rights be again invaded. But because we were for exerting proper and efficient means of securing those rights invaded at New Orleans, are we to be told that it is our duty per fas et nefas to take it? If so let us have it one way or the other—either by war or by purchase; and if in the latter way, do not let us obtain it in such a manner as shall compel us to resort to war. The object is certainly of great importance, and we ought to make great sacrifices to obtain it by peaceable means, but when acquired by these means, at a great sacrifice of treasure, let us avoid laying the foundation for future wars.

The gentlemen have resorted to peculiar grounds to show our right to this Territory; they have resorted to verbal information. The gentlemen say the cession to France is well known to all Europe. Suppose I say I am not willing to rely on such general information, and that not being so learned as they, I have not obtained this information. But the gentleman from Virginia refers to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, and he informs us that the treaty will not afford us the information we wish. The gentleman may have access to the Cabinet, but I belong to an humble and unlearned minority. The majority of this House, who may be acquainted with its contents, may say to us "you must act in the dark, it is sufficient that we have seen it." For my part, although disposed to pay great deference to the learning of the gentlemen from New York and Virginia, yet as a Representative of the American people, called upon to legislate on objects of vast interest, I consider myself entitled to correct information, and that I ought not, instead of receiving this information, be referred to newspaper statements.

But, say gentlemen, it is unnecessary to be acquainted with the facts we ask for, and the gentleman from Virginia has referred to my observation, that, though Spain may not now oppose the execution of our Treaty with France, yet the time may arise when she will call upon us to prove the validity of our title. All I meant was, that if Spain considers herself entitled to Louisiana, though she may not, under the pressure of present circumstances, oppose our taking possession of it, yet if, by a revolution in European politics, she shall retrieve her national character, and demand of us by what right we hold this territory, what answer shall we make? We may say it is ours by Treaty with France; but suppose it shall then appear that the possession by France was mere usurpation, would we under such circumstances enter into a contest with Spain for it? She might have yielded under the pressure of imperious circumstances to the giving it up, without any justice in the measure. I would wish to avoid in this business all seeds of war; and is it, in this point of light, of no importance to learn whether or not France has a good title? Are we to be satisfied with the mere declaration of France to this effect? Suppose we pay France the fifteen millions, and Spain afterwards demands the territory, and we call on France to refund the money—France will assuredly say, you made the purchase with your eyes open, we recited to you the title under which we ceded the territory, and you accepted it at your peril. I apprehend, therefore, that it becomes important to inquire, not whether the treaty has been made according to the forms of the Constitution, but whether Spain has actually ceded Louisiana to France, and whether Spain assents or dissents from the cession. If she assents, it may be inferred that France has perfected her engagements; and if she does not assent, that she has failed to comply with them.

With regard to the precedent in the case of the British Treaty, appealed to on the other side, we may say, if correct on that occasion, it is likewise correct on this occasion. You called for papers then, and we call for them now. But I conceive there is no analogy between the cases. For how does our call affect or impugn the treaty-making power of the President and Senate?

I apprehend that to postpone this motion is to negative it. We call for information. Gentlemen say act first, and we will then give it to you. Need gentlemen be again told that we do not make the demand through a blind curiosity, but because we deem it absolutely necessary to know whether the title is in us before we pass the laws to carry the treaty into effect?

MR. ELLIOT.—Mr. Speaker, as I have not spoken on the question of postponement, and although my views of the subject are almost exactly the same with those of the gentleman from New York who made the motion, yet as I shall vote against the motion, and as I wish to appear consistent in my conduct, I am under the necessity of again asking the indulgence of the House for a few moments; it shall be but for a few moments only. When I was up before, I mentioned that I had other objections to the resolution than merely its prematurity, but that I did not think it necessary to state them. Those objections, in part, have since fallen from a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. LYON;) they apply to the form of the resolution; to the propriety and decorousness of its expression. It struck me at first, it still strikes me, as improper and indecorous towards the President. I have no idea that such was the intention of the gentleman from Connecticut, for I know, at least I believe, that he is a gentleman of honorable feelings, and utterly incapable of anything of that nature; but such was the impression on my mind, and I cannot remove it. I am therefore for an absolute rejection of every part of the resolution; I cannot vote even for a postponement.

I hope I shall not be considered as guilty of very great vanity in observing that my objections to the resolution as being premature have not been directly answered by gentlemen on the other side of the House. It is said the treaty may not have been constitutionally made. This must be determined from the face of the treaty itself, and not from any of those extraneous considerations which gentlemen are laboring to connect with it. The view taken of the subject by the gentleman from Virginia is certainly the only correct one. Let us first decide whether we will impart our Constitutional agency to carry the treaty into operation, and when we consider ourselves as having acquired the territory and its inhabitants, proceed to legislate accordingly. I shall not deny that, presuming upon the good faith of the French Government, and of course that we shall obtain the possession according to the laws of nations, we may immediately proceed to pass such laws as may be necessary in that event. But of this subject the President and ourselves have the same views.

He speaks of "ulterior provisions," and of "temporary provisions." With reference to these provisions alone the gentleman from Connecticut moves his resolution, and on this subject alone wishes for information. The President says:

"As permanent arrangements for this object may require time and deliberation, it is for your consideration whether you will not forthwith make such temporary provisions for the preservation, in the meanwhile, of order and tranquillity in the country, as the case may require."

And he tells us that such information on the subject as he has been able to collect shall be laid before us in a few days, or as soon as the subject shall be in a state for our consideration. I am willing to take him at his word, and when we arrive at such a stage of the business as to render that information desirable, if the President is forgetful of us, I shall be ready to call upon him for a fulfilment of his promise.

Mr. MITCHELL withdrew his motion of postponement. He had made it, he said, to save time, but as the time he hoped to have saved was already consumed, he would waive it. The gentleman from Connecticut declares his disposition to carry the treaty into effect by all necessary measures, without delay. To accommodate him he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. GRISWOLD, but for one idea thrown out, should not again ask the indulgence of the House. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) observes, that when we shall go into Committee of the Whole, we shall have but one resolution before us, to wit:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for carrying into effect the treaty and convention concluded at Paris on the 13th of April, 1803, between the United States of America and the French Republic.

And that in debating on this resolution there will be no necessity for the documents, which it is the object of the resolution to obtain. There would be weight in this observation, but for the circumstance that it is competent for any gentleman in committee to move any resolution connected with the subject. It was competent to move that this or that article should be carried into effect; for the provision of a military force to take possession of New Orleans; for the appointment by the President of governor or judges. The gentleman has admitted that these documents may be useful when we go into the details of the subject. If so, they certainly will be useful when we shall be in Committee of the Whole. Besides, if it be proper to agree to the general resolution, it would be absurd to agree to it unless previously satisfied that some laws are necessary. If the United States have no right to govern the province, it is absurd to say that it is expedient to make provision by law for governing it. And unless gentlemen can show this or that law to be necessary, we ought not to agree to the general proposition. The argument, therefore, of the gentleman from Virginia is entitled to no weight.

Mr. RANDOLPH would not have trespassed further on the patience of the House had he not been called on personally by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GODDARD.) He was sorry that whilst bearing testimony to the ingenuity of the gentleman's colleague on his left (Mr. GRISWOLD) he had been unable to include the gentleman himself in the description; on all other subjects he should be ready to acknowledge the gentleman's ingenuity, but on this he must be excused from subscribing to the opinion of the gentleman from Vermont. Candor forbade it. He regretted that the gentleman from Connecticut had felt this exclusion so deeply, and could he have foreseen it, Mr. R. would have endeavored to conceal the impression which the gentleman's display had made upon him.

The gentleman asks, when did he or his friends evince a disposition to acquire territory west of the Mississippi? Mr. R. said he must have been misunderstood if his position had been taken with such latitude; but the gentleman immediately corrects himself by asking when was a disposition for hostility with Spain manifested by any description of persons in that House? If his memory did not deceive him, gentlemen had that day declared that the interruption of the navigation of the Mississippi justified warlike measures on our part. If, then, to acquire the navigation of the river, with the bare right of deposit, would have justified hostility, surely the acquisition of the island of New Orleans and both banks of the river, giving a perfect security to our navigation, and the entire, uninterrupted control of the river, would have justified an appeal to arms—unless the unlucky ingenuity of the gentleman from Connecticut would undertake to prove that a part was less than the whole, and that although the attaining of a qualified and precarious right to a given object furnished good cause for war, yet to acquire an unqualified and secure right to the same object would not justify hostility. Surely, it is not meant to insinuate that all which was heard on this subject last winter was mere clamor, and that notwithstanding the war-speeches of the day, war was never contemplated by those who delivered them. If, then, the obtaining of the free navigation of the Mississippi was good cause of war, surely the obtaining that which was essential to the unfettered exercise of this right, (New Orleans,) which, in other words, is the right itself, would have justified hostility; but we have not only obtained the command of the mouth of the Mississippi, but of the Mobile, with its widely extended branches; and there is not now a single stream of note, rising within the United States, and falling into the Gulf of Mexico, which is not entirely our own, the Apalachicola excepted. To these acquisitions are added the extensive region west of the Mississippi and northeast of New Mexico. If the possession of the right of deposit there, or the island of New Orleans, a part of this acquisition, would have justified hostility, is the importance of this part lessened by having the whole added to it?

The gentleman had complimented his learned friend from New York, (for so he must insist upon calling him,) and had been liberal enough to include him also, on their very great learning. Mr. R. acknowledged himself altogether unworthy of the honor of this association; and lamented his inability to return the compliment, but at an expense of sincerity and truth, which even the gentleman from Connecticut, he hoped, would be unwilling to require. The gentleman says, that we must have seen the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, because we have undertaken to say what it does not contain. This may be logic in some schools, but surely it does not deserve, in this House, so respectable an epithet. Might we not declare, without having seen it, that this treaty does not contain the Declaration of American Independence? It is insinuated that certain gentlemen possess avenues to information, which are closed to another description of members of this House. Although he did not mean to attempt to satisfy the jealous spirit which had so frequently manifested itself in surmises of this sort, yet, Mr. R. said, he had access to no information but such as it was in the power of every gentleman to obtain. Without having seen the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, (although he had seen as much of it, he believed, as the Executive, from whom gentlemen require a copy of the instrument; that is to say, the extract from it, contained in our treaty with France,) he would undertake to affirm, that it did not accurately define the limits of Louisiana. And the House would perceive that he hazarded little by this assertion. Being apprized that the boundaries of this country were not specially described in any previous convention, whether of a general nature, as the Peace of 1783, the Treaty of Paris, in 1763, of Aix-la-Chapelle, or any other pacification of Europe of an anterior date to the Peace of Ryswick, in 1697, which was posterior to the settlement of the country by France, or in any particular convention between France and Spain; that of 1762 conveying Louisiana to this last Power; the family compact, or any other known stipulation between the parties; he could not fail to know that, unless an accurate description of the boundaries in question was contained in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, it must be sought for in documents of another sort. Now, that article of this treaty which describes the extent and limits of Louisiana, is contained in the treaty before us. Here Mr. R. read the extract, and asked if it were possible that the Treaty of St. Ildefonso could contain a description of Louisiana by certain specific boundaries, when it was described by that treaty in such language? Had certain limits been agreed upon, would not the treaty have described those limits? Would it not have resorted to those rivers, highlands, parallels of latitude, or degrees of longitude, had such been laid down, instead of the definition which had been given? "Such as it was possessed by France, such as it then was in the possession of Spain, and such as it ought to be in consequence of subsequent treaties." The treaty between the United States and France, in describing the country ceded to us, having quoted the description of it contained in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, are we not warranted in concluding that the Treaty of St. Ildefonso contains no other more definite description of the country? Is not the inference irresistible, that, had it contained such a definition, by that definition it would have been ceded to us? The gentleman from Connecticut would therefore perceive that, without information other than that which is accessible to every man, it was not difficult to ascertain the fact in question. As to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, he professed an entire ignorance of it, the extract in question excepted. He had always understood it to have been a secret treaty. He left the House to judge how far, under these circumstances, he had erred in refusing his sanction to the character of ingenuity and learning with which, on this occasion, the gentleman had been complimented by the member from Vermont.

Gentlemen profess a wish to debate the merits of the treaty, and yet all their arguments go to show that it is an illusive bargain, a ruinous contract; and, so far, are applicable only to the question, "Ought the laws to be passed for carrying it into effect?" The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GODDARD) relied much on a very singular argument, the future reclamation of this country by Spain. She may, indeed, truckle now to the will of the First Consul, but hereafter she may be in a condition to assert her rights. He was at a loss to know in what language a Minister of Spain would demand the possession of a country, occupied for years by the United States, under a solemn and public treaty with France, to which Spain shall have given her tacit acquiescence, against which she shall have entered no protest or remonstrance. He had not as much difficulty to conceive the answer that would be returned her by some millions of citizens of the United States, seated on and near the lands in question, in case her application carried anything of hostility along with it.

Whilst he was up—and he would not have risen but for the satisfaction of the gentleman from

H. OF R.

Connecticut, he would notice an observation of his colleague (Mr. GRISWOLD) that, although on the mere abstract question, whether the treaty ought to be carried into effect, information as to the mode of doing it was necessary; yet, as every gentleman would be free to move in the Committee of the Whole, specific propositions, it was proper, to enable the House to judge of those propositions, that this information should be previously possessed by them. But, surely, the House may believe it expedient to pass these laws without having any idea of the skeletons of the particular bills. When these specific propositions shall have been made, they will go to particular committees, who will obtain of the proper departments the necessary information—of these committees the gentlemen and his friends will be members. So much of the treaty as touches the appropriation of money, on our part, will go, of course, to the Financial Committee, of which the gentleman has long and deservedly been a member. Other propositions will be submitted to other committees. If the bills which they present are, in the opinion of gentlemen, inefficient, they will have it in their power to show it; to demonstrate the hostility of Spain, and to bring forward other measures better calculated to insure the desired effect.

Mr. R. apologized for his long and repeated intrusion on the House, which the personal application of the gentleman from Connecticut had produced, and he hoped justified, and thanked them for their polite and patient attention.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he should vote for the first part of the resolution, as well as for that part which related to the order by Spain for the delivery. Though it might not be in the power of the Executive to show that the stipulations made by France had been complied with, yet it would be in their power to show an order for the delivery to the French, under the sign manual of His Catholic Majesty, and this would be conclusive evidence of the title of France.

Mr. ELLIOT.—I must again ask the attention of the House to a very few observations. Whatever may be said of newspaper information, there are occasions when we must be governed by it, when we can obtain no other. I am very confident, and I believe every member of this House believes, that the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, of the first of October, 1800, between the First Consul of the French Republic and His Catholic Majesty, was a secret treaty. I believe it never has been published. If it has been, every editor of a newspaper in the United States, every person in the habit of reading, may be supposed to have access to it, equally with the President. There is the greatest probability, however, that neither the First Consul nor His Catholic Majesty could, at this day, publish that treaty without being guilty of a breach of faith, and that, if the President possesses it, it has been confidentially communicated to him. Whether it be a secret or a public treaty, we have no right to take it for granted, as contemplated by the resolution, that it is in the possession of the President; and we have no right to require it from him.

5th CON.—14

I am disposed to do perfect justice to the pure intentions, the candid views of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) in relation to this subject. He may be able to justify himself for voting in favor of that resolution, but I cannot. I conceive it would be highly improper.

The question was taken on agreeing to the first member of the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the treaty between the French Republic and Spain, of the 1st of October, 1800.

The House divided—ayes 59, noes 59. The Speaker declaring himself in the affirmative, the motion was carried.

Mr. RODNEY suggested an alteration in the second member of the resolution, so as to read "instrument," instead of "deed."

Mr. GRISWOLD had no objection to the modification.

The second member, so modified, was read as follows:

"Together with a copy of the instrument of cession from Spain, executed in pursuance of the same treaty conveying Louisiana to France, (if any such instrument exists.)"

Mr. HUGER confessed his impressions to be favorable to the treaty, though the arguments urged that day, certainly possessed great weight. He was rather of opinion that no such instrument, as that referred to in the resolution, existed. But if it did exist, its publication would certainly be satisfactory to the people and the House. He declared himself ready to vote for carrying the treaty into effect.

Mr. NICHOLSON did not know whether his remarks had been correctly understood. He did not know whether the document he alluded to could strictly be called the instrument of cession. He had drawn an amendment to this part of the resolution, which he would propose, if in order, to wit:

"Or other instrument showing that the Spanish Government had ordered the province of Louisiana to be delivered to France."

The SPEAKER said, the House having agreed to insert the word "instrument," it was not in order to receive a substitute.

Mr. HUGER moved to reconsider the vote of the House in favor of the insertion of the word "instrument."

Motion lost—ayes 24.

The question was then taken on the second member, as above stated, and lost—ayes 34.

The question was then taken on the third member, viz:

"Also, copies of such correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government or Minister of Spain, (if any such correspondence has taken place,) as will show the assent or dissent of Spain to the purchase of Louisiana by the United States."

And lost—ayes 34.

The question was then taken on the last member of the motion, and lost, without a division, viz:

Amendment to the Constitution.

OCTOBER, 1803.

"Together with copies of such other documents as may be in the Department of State, or any other department of this Government, tending to ascertain whether the United States have, in fact, acquired any title to the province of Louisiana by the treaties with France of the 30th of April, 1803.

The question recurring on the whole of the resolution, as amended,

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the second member by adding to the end thereof:

"Together with a copy of any instrument in possession of the Executive, showing that the Spanish Government has ordered the province of Louisiana to be delivered to the Commissary or other agent of the French Government."

Agreed to—ayes 64.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the whole of the original motion, amended as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House, a copy of the treaty between the French Republic and Spain, of the 1st October, 1800, together with a copy of any instrument in possession of the Executive, showing that the Spanish Government has ordered the province of Louisiana to be delivered to the Commissary or other agent of the French Government."

And lost—yeas 57, nays 59, as follows:

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee on propositions of amendment to the Constitution.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the different States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution, viz:

"In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person having a majority of all the Electors for President shall be the President; and if there shall be no such majority, the President shall be chosen from the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list for President, by the House of Representatives, in the manner directed by the Constitution. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President, and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution."

Mr. DAWSON observed, that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, that part of it which related to the election of a President and Vice President had been objected to; and evils likely to occur had been foreseen by some gentlemen at that day. Experience had shown that they were not mistaken. Every gentleman in that House knew the situation in which the country had been placed by the controverted election of a Chief Magistrate; it was one which he trusted never would return. It had been a subject much reflected on by the people, and by the State Legislatures, several of which had declared their approbation of the principle contained in the resolution reported by the committee. This House had two years since ratified a similar amendment by a Constitutional majority of two-thirds. At that time no objections were made to the principle of the amendment. All the objection then made was on account of the lateness of the day and thinness of the House. Mr. D. considered it unnecessary to make any further remarks at that time, as he could not anticipate any objections that might be urged. He moved that the Committee should rise and report the resolution without amendment.

Mr. J. CLAY, though in favor of the principle of the amendment, was of opinion that, as to some of its parts, it required alteration. He therefore moved

"But if no person have such majority, then the House of Representatives shall immediately proceed to choose by ballot from the two persons having the greatest number of votes, one of them for President; or if there be three or more persons having an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall in like manner, from the persons having such equality of votes, choose the President; or if there be one person having a greater number of votes—not being a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed—than any other person, and two or more persons who have an equal number of votes one with the other, then the House of Representatives shall in like manner, from among such persons having the greater number of votes and such other persons having an equality of votes, choose the President.”

OCTOBER, 1803.

H. OF R.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT thought the amendment liable to objection.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL was in favor of the principle contained in the amendment. He considered to be the duty of this House, in introducing an amendment to the Constitution on this point, to secure to the people the benefits of choosing the President, so as to prevent a contravention of their will as expressed by Electors chosen by them; resorting to Legislative interposition only in extraordinary cases: and when this should be rendered necessary, so guarding the exercise of Legislative power, that those only should be capable of Legislative election who possessed a strong evidence of enjoying the confidence of the people. This was the true spirit and principle of the Constitution, whose object was, through the several organs of the Government, faithfully to express the public opinion. For this reason he was in favor of the proposed amendment. By it we shall make a less innovation on the spirit of the Constitution than by rejecting it, and adopting the report of the select committee. There were obvious reasons why the persons from whom a choice may be made should be fewer in case of a designation of the office than heretofore. At present the whole number of electoral votes is one hundred and seventy-six. As the Constitution now stands, four candidates might have an equal number of votes, or three might have a majority, viz: one hundred and seventeen each. According to the proposed amendment, but one can have a majority, and if two persons should be equal and highest, it is not probable that the third candidate will have many votes.

Mr. GRISWOLD said it was very difficult to ascertain the precise import of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania by barely hearing it read from the Chair. In the meaning therefore which he gave it, he might perhaps be mistaken. If not mistaken, it involved a principle and implied a change, which he had never before heard suggested on that floor, or in the part of the country from which he came. It is well known to every member, that under the Constitution as it at present stands, the votes given for a President in this House are by States, and not according to the majority of the members of the whole body. The amendment, as reported by the select committee, preserves this original feature of the Constitution by prescribing that the election shall be proceeded with as pointed out by the Constitution. But the present amendment varies this mode, according to which it is to be made without respect to States. Of course a majority of the members are to decide. He submitted it to gentlemen whether they were willing in this way to sacrifice the interests and rights of the smaller States. If this be the intention of gentlemen, we ought to have time to deliberate on the subject before it is pressed to a decision. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will explain whether this is his intention.

Mr. J. CLAY begged leave explicitly to state, for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Connecticut, that it was not his intention to change that part of the Constitution which prescribed that the votes should be by States; and if it would induce the gentleman to vote for the resolution he had moved, he would add the words of the Constitution, viz:

“But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.”

These words were accordingly added.

Mr. DAWSON observed that this proposition had been submitted to the select committee, who had considered it more objectionable than that reported. Their object was to innovate as little as possible on the Constitution. A great part of it referred to cases so extremely remote as were not likely to happen. The only material change it made was to reduce the number of persons from whom a choice should be made from three to two. At present the election for a President and Vice President was made from the five highest on the list. As, according to the proposed amendment, a designation of the persons voted for as President and Vice President was to be made, it was considered that by giving the three highest to the House of Representatives, from which to choose a President, and the two highest to the Senate, from which to choose a Vice President, the spirit of the Constitution would not be changed. He hoped therefore the report of the committee would be agreed to. He believed it comprehended all cases which were probable; and he further believed that if they spent a month they would not devise an amendment that would provide for all possible cases that may happen.

Mr. CLORTON said he rose to express his approbation of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLAY.) He said that indeed the amendment could not but be acceptable to him, inasmuch as it corresponded with the ideas he had the honor to express to the Committee on this subject the other day. He begged leave now to make a few remarks in addition to those which he had then stated. He said, if anything is to be lamented as a defect in the fundamental principles of our Government, that defect perhaps consists in a departure from the plain and simple modes of immediate election by the people as to some of the branches of the Government. He did not mean however now to discuss, nor did he know that he ever should discuss, this point. The Constitution of the United States having established a different principle in respect to the election of the several departments of the Government, except that branch of the Legislature which this House composes; and the object of the proposed amendment to the Constitution not being the transmutation of a fundamental principle, but merely an alteration in the mode heretofore directed of electing one branch of the Government according to the principle already established, his business and his object was to state to this Committee those ideas which occurred to him on this occasion as suited to the subject as it now stands before the Committee.

When the framers of this Constitution, said Mr. C., submitted it to the consideration of the people of the several States, drawn as it is, directing the election of President and Vice President to be made through the medium of Electors chosen by the people for that purpose, never could it have been their intention in submitting, or the intention of the people in accepting the Constitution, to admit a principle that any eventual Legislative election would be proper, if the object of it did not bear the stamp of public confidence. They never could have abandoned that great political consideration that the people, as the primary source of all power, should first give to those particular citizens, among whom such Legislative choice might be made, the evidence of a very considerable share of their confidence. The Electors are the organs, who, acting from a certain and unquestioned knowledge of the choice of the people, by whom they themselves were appointed, and under immediate responsibility to them, select and announce those particular citizens, and affix to them by their votes an evidence of the degree of public confidence which is bestowed upon them. The adoption of this medium, through which the election should be made, in preference to the mode of immediate election by the people, was no abandonment of the great principle, that the appointment of the constituted authorities ought to be conformable to the public will. It was no abandonment of that principle in respect to the President and Vice President. The adoption of this medium in the first resort, and the adoption of this alternative of a Legislative election in the last resort, were not intended as disparagements to the energy of that principle—were not intended to operate any diminution of its force. The spirit, the genius of the Government, is the same. The same principle was intended to influence its operations; the same principle was intended to influence its elections, although in a different form and after a different manner. It is a great characteristic feature of the Government. It is a primary, essential, and distinguishing attribute of the Government, that the will of the people should be done; and that the elections should be according to the will of the people.

Mr. C. said that most seriously considering the principles of the Government in such a point of view as he had the honor to state to the Committee, he was irresistibly impressed with the opinion that a Legislative election of President or Vice President, whenever resorted to, should be restrained to the smallest number above an unit, or to those persons who have equal electoral votes. He considered it as a position clearly and unquestionably true, that if the field of election, when not decided by the voice of the people themselves, should be left too wide, more chances will there always be for the introduction of abuses in determining on a choice, if those whose province it shall be to decide, should be actuated by a spirit adverse to the public sentiment. Results ungrateful to the public feeling might indeed become sources of discontent truly to be lamented. The demon of discord might be called forth, and stalking over our land, might unfortunately produce a state of things very different from that peaceful, tranquil state, which would follow a decision more conformable to the will of the people. Such a decision he believed would be insured were the election to be confined to those two persons only who had received the most ample testimony of the public confidence, or to those who had been stamped with equal testimonials of that confidence.

For the reasons, Mr. C. said, which he had stated, he was in favor of the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He had, indeed, he said, prepared an amendment to the same effect, but was anticipated by that gentleman. He said, if it were in order, he would offer it as a substitute for that amendment. He then read it in his place, as follows:

“The Electors shall make two lists, one of which shall contain the names of all the persons voted for as President, and the number of votes given to each person respectively; the other list shall contain the names of all the persons voted for as Vice President, and the number of votes given to each person respectively; which two lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes on the list containing the votes for President shall be the President if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed. If on the list containing the votes for President no person have a majority of the whole number of the Electors appointed, then from the two highest on that list the House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for President, unless more than two persons have an equal number of votes, and that number shall be the highest on the list; in such a case the said House shall, in like manner, choose one of those persons for President; but, if one person only have the highest number on the list, and that number be not a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if two or more other persons have an equal number of votes, if that number be the next highest, then from the person having the highest number and the persons having equal votes, the said House of Representatives shall, in like manner, choose one for President.”

Mr. C. said, he was not tenacious of his own composition, but he believed what he had prepared went somewhat further than the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and provided more explicitly as to the mode of proceeding of the Electors in making lists of their votes. On a subject of such immense importance, as the present, a subject which might involve the liberty and happiness of millions yet unborn, it was necessary that the expressions should be as clear and as definite as possible, that there ought to be no ambiguity, no expressions which might admit of misconstructions; that he had endeavored so to draw that which he had read to the Committee, in which he had thought it safer to repeat phrases than refer to them by relative expressions. He hoped that the decision would be conformable to the ideas contained in the proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to receive the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, unless that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was previously withdrawn.

Mr. GREGG.—It was impossible fully to comprehend the two propositions offered, barely by hearing them read. Amendments to the Constitution were of great importance. He felt at a loss how to act in the present instance, not clearly understanding the resolutions proposed. He was in favor of the principle they contained, and had always been so. He had been in Congress in the year 1796 when the first proposition to this effect was made by a gentleman from New Hampshire. The inconveniences attending the last election had strengthened his conviction of the propriety of an amendment similar in substance to that offered. He viewed, therefore, with pleasure the attention now paid to the subject by the House, and hoped an amendment would take place at the present time. The more simple that amendment was, the more likely it would be to be approved by the States. In order ultimately to simplify it, so as to render it the least objectionable to the States, he wished every member, who had formed in his mind an eligible proposition, would now bring it forward, that the whole might be printed.

Mr. J. CLAY said, as there existed considerable difference of opinion, he would withdraw his motion in order to move that the Committee should rise, when he would move a recommitment of the report of the select committee.

Mr. NICHOLSON said that, before the question was taken on the rising of the Committee, he would offer an amendment to the resolution reported by the select committee. It was his opinion that the question of principle should be settled in the House; if not so settled, it would be impossible for the report of any select committee to meet the approbation of the House. In the select committee a variety of propositions had been offered; the Committee reported one, to which they had agreed; there were still endless amendments offered, which he was convinced would continue to be offered until some principle was fixed by the House. In making an amendment to the Constitution on this point, they ought to guard against all possible difficulties. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes to guard against those difficulties. But cases may arise in which the amendment of the select committee will not be adequate. It says the election shall be made from the three highest persons voted for, but there may be cases where there are no three highest, where four, ten, or twenty of the persons voted for shall be equal in number of votes. This case is not embraced in the resolution. For this reason, Mr. N. said he should have been pleased in having the question taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But as that amendment had been withdrawn, he would move another, that the principle might be settled. He said he could conceive of no objection to giving the House of Representatives the right of making a choice of President from all those voted for by the Electors. The case, stated some days since by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLOPTON,) of one candidate having 87 votes, a second candidate having 86 votes, and three others having one vote, was extreme; and, if it should occur, he could see no inconvenience likely to result from the House of Representatives enjoying the right of making a choice from the whole five. It would be remembered that the House were chosen by the people, and would, in the selection they made, express the public will, as well as the Electors themselves. The feelings of the one would be in unison with those of the other; nor could he conceive that a House of Representatives would ever exist that would dare to choose a person having one vote. None would be found hardy enough to violate the public sentiment. He therefore moved to strike out from the report of the Committee all that part of it which confined the choice to the three highest. If the majority of the Committee should not coincide with him in opinion, he should wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania to renew his proposition. And, if the Committee concurred in neither, he should wish some other gentlemen to bring forward another principle. For, if the principle were not fixed there, he was convinced they would be involved in endless difficulties by the reports of select committees.

Mr. N. then moved to strike out these words:

"And if there shall be no such majority the President shall be chosen from the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list for President by the House of Representatives."

And insert in lieu thereof the following words:

"And if no such person have a majority, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose a President from among those persons who have not been voted for as President."

Mr. DAWSON said that when the gentleman from Maryland moved the appointment of a select committee, he had voted against it, and for the very reason now assigned by him. As to the propositions at present offered, they had been severally reflected upon by the select committee; and, if referred to that committee, the House ought, in the first instance, to decide the principle. As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, he conceived it scarcely necessary to make a single remark upon it, as the House was disposed to reduce rather than to extend the number of persons from whom a choice should be made. If adopted, it will give the House of Representatives a right to vote for 176 persons, as no candidate might have more than one vote.

Mr. NICHOLSON believed the proposition of the select committee would reduce them to the same situation as if of the 176 votes given, one was given to each candidate, no one would be higher than another. The proper reply to this remark was, that it was an extreme case, not likely to happen. Mr. N. said, he was not so anxious that his amendment should succeed, as that the principle should be fixed, in that House, some way or other.

Mr. GODDARD said, though he would not pledge himself to vote for the proposed amendment to the Constitution, in any shape whatever, yet he was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland. He thought with him that there would be no great danger from the latitude allowed the House of Representatives, as they were chosen by the people as well as the Electors; nor could he perceive why they were more to be distrusted than the Electors. But the principal reason that operated with him in favor of the amendment was, that it extended the right of suffrage in the House of Representatives. It is well known that our system is that of a Confederation. There appeared to him no danger of 176 persons being voted for; the nature of the Government was such that but few persons would be voted for. But, if no choice is made by the Electors, he wished the right of the House of Representatives to be extended for this reason, because it will increase the power of the small States. As he conceived, the original proposition went effectually to impair the rights of the small States; and, indeed, any amendment would have that effect; but the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland having this effect as little as possible, he should vote for it.

Mr. SMILIE would wish one principle altered in the report of the select committee, viz: that which confined the election of the President to the three highest persons voted for. It was impossible for human wisdom to provide for all cases that might occur. Their time was not well spent in providing for cases extremely remote. He had but one object in view, the designation of office; and the more simple the proposition, the more likely they were to obtain this object. It should be recollected that the Constitution was the act of the people, and ought not to be altered till inconveniences actually arise under it. He believed, though particular parts might be defective in theory, they ought not to be changed till practical inconveniences had been experienced. No such inconvenience had yet been felt from choosing the President from the five highest on the list. Is it, then, prudent to embarrass the great principle, in which they generally concurred, with incidental propositions, when there was no necessity for them? This amendment was to obtain the assent of thirteen Legislative bodies before it would be binding. The simpler, then, the proposition, the more likely it was to succeed. His idea, therefore, was to leave the Constitution as it now stood, so far as it related to a choice being made from the five highest, and only so far to change it as related to a designation of the office.

Mr. SANFORD said the great object of the amendment ought to be to prevent persons voted for as Vice President from becoming President. If the amendment effected this, it was sufficient. All other innovation upon the Constitution was improper; and no danger could arise from extending the right of the House of Representatives to making a choice from the five highest.

Mr. RODNEY said that in the select committee he had been in favor of the number stated in the Constitution. He was not for innovating on the Constitution one tittle more than was absolutely necessary. As to the mere designation of office, the people looked for and expected it; and if that were obtained, they would be satisfied. He well knew that if amendments to this simple proposition were multiplied, objections to the whole would also be increased. Having been originally in favor of five, and thinking the inconveniences apprehended by some gentlemen not likely to occur, he should vote in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, principally for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Connecticut, that it would allow to the smaller States a larger scope of choice.

Mr. ELLIOT hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland would not prevail; and coming, as he did himself, from a small State, he trusted the House would pardon him for assigning his reasons for that hope. He felt as much confidence in the House of Representatives as the gentleman from Connecticut; but he was of opinion that their discretion ought to be limited. The amendment will give the House of Representatives the unqualified power of electing from the whole number on the list of persons voted for as President, and on that ground he opposed it. It was said to be a question of larger and smaller States, and those who represent the smaller States were called upon to check the usurpation of the larger States. Our system was undoubtedly federative, and there might be danger of an usurpation of the large States if the small ones were not protected by the Constitution. His wish was that they might be so guarded. But he still thought the discretion of the House of Representatives ought to be limited. When this subject was first discussed, an observation of a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLOPTON) had struck him with force. That gentleman had correctly stated that, according to the proposition then before the House, one candidate might have eighty-seven votes, another eighty-six, and three have one vote each, and a choice be made from among the candidates having but one vote. Should the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland obtain, the same right would exist in the House of Representatives. But the gentlemen asks if any House of Representatives will dare to elect a person having but one vote. He hoped they always would dare to do their duty, and it would then be their Constitutional right. But Mr. E. thought they ought not to possess this discretion. Gentlemen further say the great object is a designation of the office. It is so. It was his sincere wish that the simple object should be obtained. But he believed there would be no danger in adding to the proposition an amendment restricting the number from which the choice should be made.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said he, too, represented a small State, and was anxious to preserve the rights of the small States. But in a great Constitutional question, while these rights were not lost sight of, principle ought also to be regarded. This he conceived to be his duty, whatever effect it might have upon the State he represented. For this reason he considered it proper to express his opinions on the present occasion. It was a vital principle to preserve the Constitution as pure as possible. This rendered it necessary to show that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLAY) came nearer to the principle of the Constitution than that offered by the gentleman from Maryland. He had already observed that, there being at present no designation, four was the smallest possible number from which a choice could be made: to this number but one was added, making, altogether, five. In future elections there will be one hundred and seventy-six Electors, and if there be a designation of office, but one person can have a majority. To confine the choice to two persons will, therefore, in principle, approach as near as possible to the original principle of the Constitution.

Mr. C. was in favor of preserving that part of the Constitution which directed the election to be made by States, wishing as little innovation as possible on the principles of the Constitution. He did not, however, conceive a mere change of words dangerous, but the establishment of a principle that deprived the people of the power of electing those who possessed the largest share of their confidence. He was decidedly in favor of whatever had this effect, as according with the true spirit of the Constitution; and he was, therefore, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. His own opinion, too, was that it was best to express in one article whatever related to the election of President and Vice President, than refer to the Constitution; by which the provisions on that subject would be rendered much clearer.

The question was then taken on Mr. NICHOLSON'S amendment, and lost—ayes 29, noes 77.

Mr. SMILIE, in order to try the principle, would move to strike out "three," and insert "five."

Mr. FINDLEY seconded the motion.

Mr. DAWSON would only repeat a remark which he had already made. The select committee, in proposing three as the number from which an election should be made, did not consider themselves as departing in the least from the spirit of the Constitution; as, when both President and Vice President were voted for without discrimination, the choice was made from five.

Mr. SMILIE observed he did not know that there would be any danger in this innovation; but it was his wish not to alter the Constitution, except in cases of necessity.

Mr. GODDARD said that he was in favor of that amendment for the same reason that he had been in favor of that proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAMPBELL) has told us that it is our duty to act, not from motives of interest, but duty. Mr. G. considered it as his duty so to act as to protect the interests of his constituents, and of the State which he had the honor to represent. The gentleman further observes that in limiting the number from which a choice may be made, we shall insure a nearer approach to the will of the people. Now what is that will, but the will of the large States of Virginia, New York, and Pennsylvania? He apprehended that there might be cases where the interests of the smaller States might be materially affected. The larger States will generally have first nomination of the persons voted for as President and Vice President. If we dislike all the candidates, neither of whom shall have a majority of all the electoral votes, we may select from among them the one that best pleases us. He considered the Constitution so framed as to guard all the States. And if gentlemen are so tenacious of its vital principle, let them suffer it to remain as it is. But if there is a determination to alter it, which he feared was the case, he hoped no greater alteration would be made than was necessary to secure the end which gentlemen professed to have in view. The greater the number of candidates, the greater, in his opinion, would be the influence of the smaller States. Nor could there be any danger from reposing a discretion in the House of Representatives, as they were elected by the people as well as the Electors; and when it was known by the people that on them devolved the eventual election, they would be chosen in reference to the discharge of this duty, as well as the other duties constitutionally imposed upon them.

Mr. ALSTON was opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) to the amendment of the select committee, because in his opinion it would have a tendency to bring the election of a President of the United States more frequently into the House of Representatives, than otherwise it would be brought; he was as much disposed to guard against the influence of the large States as any member upon that floor.

The gentleman from Connecticut last up (Mr. GODDARD) was in favor of the amendment, because he thought it calculated to lessen the influence of larger States. For his part, Mr. A. thought very differently from that gentleman; he believed that, provided the amendment should be acceded to, it would be an inducement to any one of the large States to prevent an election of President by the Electors of the several States, that if the votes of a large State should be withheld from any of the candidates proposed as President, it would prevent such candidate from obtaining a majority of all the votes of the Electors. What then, Mr. A. asked, would be the consequence? The choice would have to be made by that House, which circumstance he never wished to witness again; this he conceived to be an important point to guard against as much as possible.

He believed the fewer the number of the candidates or persons voted for, that the choice of President was confined to, the less chance there would be for that House to be called upon to make it. Should they adopt the amendment proposed, a strong inducement would be held out to any one of the large States, which might be displeased with the candidate proposed as President, to withhold the vote of their State, by which a majority of the votes of all the Electors would not be given to any one candidate, because the whole vote of a large State given to their favorite would be certain to bring him within the five highest upon the list; but, on the contrary, should they confine the choice to be made out of the two highest upon the list, agreeably to the proposition of another gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. CLAY,) which had been withdrawn, many still would be more likely to promote the election of one of the candidates most likely to get the largest number of votes. He was therefore much better pleased with the motion which had been withdrawn. He should therefore give his vote against the present proposition, and should it be rejected, he would himself renew the proposition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side of the House, (Mr. CLAY,) should it not be renewed by the gentleman himself.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he came to the House under the impression that another subject would have occupied their attention on account of its primary importance, not meaning, however, to disparage the importance of an amendment to the Constitution. But on a subject which must be discussed in a few days, if at all, it was improper that time should be lost. The proposed amendment to the Constitution was not, he believed, so extremely pressing as to require immediate attention. The subject to which Mr. R. had expected the attention of the House, would have been first directed was the Treaty with France. Hoping that the Committee would have decided on the amendment at an early hour, he had refrained from any motion. But perceiving that a decision was not likely soon to be made, he would move that the Committee should rise, for the purpose of taking up the treaty respecting Louisiana.

Mr. DAWSON opposed the rising of the Committee.

The question was taken on Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion, and carried—yeas 60, nays 55. When the Committee rose.

And on motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, October 25.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a report and sundry documents, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and H, prepared in pursuance of an act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LOUISIANA TREATY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Message from the President of the United States, of the twenty-first instant, enclosing a Treaty and Conventions entered into and ratified by the United States and the French Republic; to which Committee of the whole House was also referred a motion for carrying the same into effect.

Mr. G. GRISWOLD said he had hoped that some gentleman, in favor of the resolution under consideration, would have risen to assign his reasons in favor of it. But no gentleman friendly to its adoption having risen, and feeling himself embarrassed, he would take the liberty of suggesting his doubts as to the propriety of the resolution. He hoped the Committee would have the candor to believe that, in stating those doubts which hung upon his mind, his object was not to delay the progress of the measures contemplated, but to gain information.

In reflecting, for the short time during which the subject had been before him, he had not been able to pursue it in all its bearings, nor to solve all the difficulties it presented. He had first asked himself where was to be found the Constitutional power of the Government to incorporate the Territory, with the inhabitants thereof, in the Union of the United States, with the privileges of citizens of the United States—is there any such power? And if there is, where is it lodged? In giving his opinion on the Constitutional right of making treaties, he would say that it was vested in the President and Senate, and that a treaty made by them on a subject constitutionally in their treaty-making power, was valid without the assent of this House. This House had, to be sure, the physical power of refusing the necessary means to carry treaties into effect; but this power was essentially different from that conferred by the Constitution. But if the treaty-making power should be exceeded, if it should be undertaken to make it operate upon subjects not constitutionally vested, he had a right to say that it was his duty not to carry it into effect. Even should its provisions be highly beneficial, it was no less their Constitutional duty to resist it. He would not undertake to say that his mind was perfectly fixed, but he entertained doubts—serious doubts; and he hoped gentlemen would candidly give them answers.

He found in the third article of the treaty that

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

Here then is a compact between the French Government and that of the United States, to admit to citizenship persons out of the jurisdiction of the United States, as it now is, and to admit territory out of the United States to be incorporated into the Union. He did not find in the Constitution such a power vested in the President and

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

Senate. If such a power be not expressly vested, it must be reserved to the people. It was not consistent with the spirit of the Constitution that territory other than that attached to the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution should be admitted; because at that time the persons who formed the Constitution of the United States had a particular respect to the then subsisting territory. They carried their ideas to the time when there might be an extended population; but they did not carry them forward to the time when an addition might be made to the Union of a territory equal to the whole United States, which additional territory might overbalance the existing territory, and thereby the rights of the present citizens of the United States be swallowed up and lost. Such a measure could not be consistent either with the spirit or the genius of the Government.

For these reasons, Mr. G. was of opinion that no such power was delegated to any department of the Government; but if such power was delegated to any department, it must, in his opinion, be to the Legislature, as he should afterwards notice. It was not consistent with the spirit of a republican government that its territory should be exceedingly large; for, as you extend your limits you increase the difficulties arising from a want of that similarity of customs, habits, and manners, so essential for its support. It was certainly difficult to draw the precise line; but there was, notwithstanding, one beyond which we should not go.

But if the right of extending our territory be given by the Constitution, its exercise is vested in the Legislative branches of the Government. In the 3d section of the fourth article of the Constitution it is said, "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Congress may admit new States,—but, according to my construction of this article, are confined to the territory belonging to the United States at the formation of the Constitution—to the territory then within the United States. Existing territory, not within the limits of any particular States, may be incorporated in the Union. He contended, therefore, that the power to incorporate new territory did not exist; and that, if it did exist, it belonged to the Legislature, and not the Executive, to incorporate it in the Union. If this were the case, it was the duty of the House to resist the usurped power exercised by the Executive.

There was another ground as to the constitutionality of the treaty; at least one which excited doubts in his mind, which he hoped gentlemen would take up and remove. In the 7th article of the treaty are these words:

"As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations for a limited time in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on: it has been agreed between the contracting parties, that the French ships coming directly from France or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce and manufactures of France or her said colonies; and the ships of Spain coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted during the space of twelve years in the port of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandise, or other or greater tonnage than paid by the citizens of the United States."

This article gives to the ships of France and Spain the same right of entering the ports of the ceded territory with our own vessels; and it precludes the ships of all other nations from the same right. Now if, as gentlemen contend, the new ceded territory with the inhabitants should become incorporated with the United States, there will be ports of entry in the United States into which French and Spanish vessels may enter on terms different from those on which they may enter other ports of the United States. The inference was that here was a favor granted to the ports of New Orleans over other ports. This was against an important principle of the Constitution; for, in the ninth section of the first article, we find, "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." This treaty then becomes a law of the land. It has made a commercial regulation. It gives to the ports of the ceded territory a preference to any other ports. Because the produce of France and Spain can be carried cheaper to their ports than to any other. If the principle contended for by gentlemen in favor of the treaty is admitted, I think I see a fatal blow proposed against the Constitution of the United States, by destroying the reciprocity of interest that unites at present the different members of the Union. Perhaps I see wrong.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose for the purpose of satisfying, so far as was in his power, the doubts expressed by the gentleman from New York. (Mr. G. GRISWOLD.) He had listened with great pleasure to the candid exposition which the gentleman had given of his objections, and from the temper which he had manifested, Mr. R. relied on being able to satisfy some of his scruples on this subject. The objections which have been urged to the motion before the Committee, resolved themselves into arguments against the constitutionality, and arguments against the expediency of the treaty proposed to be carried into effect. As it would be needless to repel objections of this last kind, unless those of the first description could be satisfactorily answered, he should first reply to the observations which had been made on the Constitutional doctrine.

He understood the gentleman from New York as denying that there existed in the United States, as such, a capacity to acquire territory; that, by the Constitution, they were restricted to the limits which existed at the time of its adoption. If this position be correct, it undeniably follows that those limits must have been accurately defined and generally known at the time when the Government took effect. Either they have been particularly described in the Constitutional compact, or are referred to as settled beyond dispute, and universally acknowledged. But this was not the fact, in either case. The Constitution not only did not describe any particular boundary, beyond which the United States could not extend, but our boundary was unsettled on our northeastern, southern, and northwestern frontier, at the time of its adoption. But perhaps we shall be told, that, although our limits were in dispute with our English and Spanish neighbors, still there were certain boundaries specified in the Treaty of Paris, of 1783, which were the actual boundaries of the United States. It was, however, a well-attested fact—one of which we possessed official information from the Executive—that the limits assigned us by that treaty were incapable of being established. A line running west, from the Lake of the Woods, not touching the Mississippi at all: it followed that the United States were without limits beyond the source of the Mississippi. It will not be denied, that, among the powers which the Government possesses under the Constitution, there exists that of settling disputes concerning our limits with the neighboring nations. This power was not only necessary in relation to the disputed boundaries on the side of Canada and Florida, but was indispensable to a government over a country of indefinite extent. The existence of this power will not be denied: it has been exercised in ascertaining our northeastern and southern frontier, and it involves in it the power of extending the limits of the Confederacy. Let us suppose that the Commissioners, under the Treaty of London, had determined the river St. John or St. Lawrence to be the true St. Croix—would not that part of the province of New Brunswick or Quebec which lies on this side of those rivers at this time have been a part of the United States? Suppose the northern boundary of Florida had been fixed, under the Treaty of San Lorenzo, to extend from the Atlantic ocean to the Gulf; would not all the country north of this line and east of the Mississippi—part of the very country conveyed by the treaty lately negotiated, and which gentlemen conceived we could not constitutionally hold—would not that country, at this time, compose a part of the United States? That the Constitution should tie us down to particular limits, without expressing those limits; that we should be restrained to the then boundaries of the United States, when it is in proof to the Committee that no such bounds existed, or do now exist, was altogether incomprehensible and inadmissible. For, if the Constitution meant the practical limits of the United States, the extent of country which we then possessed—our recent acquisitions, on the side of Canada and the Natchez, could not be defended. But, sir, said Mr. R., my position is not only maintainable by the reason of the Constitution, but by the practice under it. Congress have expressed, in their own acts, a solemn recognition of the principle, that the United States, in their Federative capacity, may acquire, and have acquired, territory. It will be recollected, that adverse claims once existed between the United States and the State of Georgia, in relation to a certain tract of country between the northern boundary of the Spanish possessions and what we contended was the southern limit of Georgia—the United States asserting that the country in question was the property of the United States, in their Confederate capacity, and the State of Georgia claiming it as hers. Although I have always advocated the claim of that State, it never was on the principle of an incapacity in the United States to acquire territory, or any other which affects the question now before us. It is true, sir, we appointed Commissioners to settle the matters in dispute, amicably, with Georgia; but in the meantime we assumed the jurisdiction, erected a government over the country, and thereby established the principle that the United States, as such, could acquire territory; the country in question, as we contended, never having been included within the limits of any particular States, and being ceded to the Confederacy by the Treaty of 1783. But perhaps it may be answered, that this acquisition, being made anterior to the date of the present Constitution, cannot affect any limitation or restriction, which it may have provided in relation to this subject; and that to prove that the old Confederation could acquire territory, is not to prove the same capacity in the present system of Government. To this I reply, that the Constitution contains no such expressed limitation, nor can any be fairly inferred from it: and that if the old Confederation—a mere government of States—a loosely connected league—all of whose powers, with many more, are possessed by the present Federal Government—if this mere alliance of States could rightfully acquire territory in their allied capacity, much more is the existing Government competent to make such an acquisition. To me the inference is irresistible.

But the gentleman does not rest himself on this ground alone. He does not embark his whole treasure in a single bottom. Granting that the United States are not destitute of capacity to acquire territory, he denies that this acquisition has been made in a regular way—Congress, says he, alone is competent to such an act. In this transaction he scents at a distance Executive encroachment, and we are called upon to assert our rights, and to repel it. If any usurpation of the privileges of Congress, or of this House, be made to appear, I pledge myself to that gentleman to join him in resisting it. But let us inquire into the fact. No gentleman will deny the right of the President to initiate business here, by message, recommending particular subjects to our attention. If the Government of the United States possess the Constitutional power to acquire territory, from foreign States, the Executive, as the organ by which we communicate with such States, must be the prime agent, in negotiating such an acquisition. Conceding, then, that the power of confirming this act, and annexing to the United States the territory thus acquired, ultimately rests with Congress, where has been the invasion of the privileges of that body? Does not the President of the United States submit this subject to Congress for their sanction? Does he not recognise the principle, which I trust we will never give up, that no treaty is binding until we pass the laws for executing it—that the powers conferred by the Constitution on Congress cannot be modified, or abridged, by any treaty whatever—that the subjects of which they have cognizance cannot be taken, in any way, out of their jurisdiction? In this procedure nothing is to be seen but a respect, on the part of the Executive, for our rights; a recognition of a discretion on our part to accord or refuse our sanction. Where then is the violation of our rights? As to the initiative, in a matter like this, it necessarily devolved on the Executive.

The unconstitutionality of this treaty is attempted to be shown by the following quotation from that instrument: "No preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another State," &c. But by the seventh article of the treaty, French and Spanish vessels, laden with the produce of their respective countries, are, for twelve years, to be admitted into the ports of the ceded territory on the same terms with our own vessels. In our other ports a discrimination is made between American and foreign bottoms. New Orleans, therefore, will enjoy an exemption, which will enable her to trade to the French and Spanish colonies on terms more advantageous than other ports. She is, therefore, a favored port, in contradiction to the express letter of the Constitution. To me it appears that this argument has more of ingenuity than of force in it—more of subtlety than of substance. Let us suppose that the treaty, instead of admitting French and Spanish vessels on the terms proposed, merely covenanted to admit American vessels on equal terms with those of France and Spain. If we had acquired this right (divested of the country) it would have been considered, and justly, as an important privilege. Annex the territory to it and you cannot accept it. You may indeed acquire either the commercial privilege, or the territory, without violating the Constitution—but take them both, and that instrument is infringed.

But the gentleman will recollect that the discrimination between foreign bottoms and our own is a creature of law, and not a provision of the Constitution. If his construction be sound it does not involve a necessary violation of the Constitution, it only involves the necessity of repealing these discriminating duties on French and Spanish products, brought in their own bottoms, into other ports than those of the ceded territory. It would therefore become gentlemen to adduce this as a proof of the inexpediency, rather than of the unconstitutionality of the treaty. For, however inexpedient it may be to repeal this discrimination, no one will contend that it is unconstitutional, and if the Constitution or the law were to give way, no one would hesitate between them. But I regard this stipulation as a part of the price of the territory. It was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which we had a right to assent. The right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded. Mr. R. said, that he expected to hear it said in the course of the debate, that the treaty in question might clash with the Treaty of London, in this particular. He would therefore take this opportunity of remarking, that the privilege granted to French and Spanish bottoms, being a part of the consideration for which we had obtained the country, and the Court of London, being officially apprized of the transaction, and acquiescing in the arrangement, it would ill become any member of that House to bring forward such an objection.

Another case may be adduced to illustrate this question of constitutionality. During the last session of Congress, they had received information of the manifestation of a disposition, on the part of the possessors of this country, to violate our rights to the navigation of the Mississippi, as secured to us by existing treaties. There was no difference of opinion but as to the mode of asserting this right. On all hands, it was agreed that we would never relinquish this great object. A certain portion of the Legislature were disposed to resort immediately to violent measures. Another portion was of opinion that it was best to waive such measures, until amicable means of settling this difference had proved ineffectual. Let us suppose this to have been the case; that our negotiation, instead of its present happy issue, had terminated in a refusal of justice. I believe there would, in that event, have been but one sentiment in this House and in this nation. We should have appealed to arms, and if fortune had only been as impartial as our cause was just, we should have possessed ourselves, at least, of a part of the territory in question. Did any one dream of denying our right to the forcible possession of New Orleans, if necessary to secure the navigation of the Mississippi? Can a nation acquire by force that which she cannot acquire by treaty? Must not the eventual right to the country, possessed by conquest, be confirmed by treaty? And is it not idle to contend that so long as we employ force we may occupy the country, but no longer; that we cannot retain it by convention? Is not this to convert the question, from a question of political right, to a question of physical power? Mr. R. said, he was now done with the Constitutional objections, and he would finish by saying something of the expediency of the measure.

The gentleman from New York seems to dread this treaty as a death-blow to our commerce and carrying trade. What is the state of that trade now, in relation to the ceded country? But a short time ago, who would have asked more than to be put on an equal footing with the possessors of that country? We now have the sovereignty of it, and only stipulate that (for 12 years) France and Spain should be admitted, not on an equal footing with us, but that their vessels, laden with their own produce, not otherwise, should pay no higher duties than our own. At the expiration of that period we can give a decided preponderance to our trade by discriminating duties. Will the hardy and enterprising New Englander shrink from a competition with France and Spain on these terms? Cannot the discriminating duties be still enforced by the existing regulations in respect to imports from New Orleans to other parts of the United States? So far from a clog on our commerce, does not this treaty unfetter the Mississippi trade and give us a preference over all other nations, except the case of the French and Spanish vessels, laden with the produce of their respective countries, and there we are on a footing with them?

Mr. R. said, that he would not dilate upon the importance of the navigation of the Mississippi, which had been the theme of every tongue, which we now possessed unfettered by the equal claim of the nation holding the west bank, a fruitful source of quarrel; but he would call the attention of the Committee to a report which had been made at the last session and to which publicity had lately been given.

I am not surprised, Mr. Chairman, that in a performance so replete with information, a single error should be discovered, especially as it does not affect the soundness of its conclusion. As long ago as the year 1673, the inhabitants of the French province of Canada explored the country on the Mississippi. A few years afterwards (1685) La Salle, with emigrants from old France, made a settlement on the Bay of St Bernard, and at the close of the 17th century, previous to the existence of Pensacola, another French settlement was made by the Governor, D'Iberville, at Mobile, and on the Isle Dauphin, or Massacre, at the mouth of that bay. In 1712, a short time previous to the peace of Utrecht, Louis XIV described the extent of the colony of Louisiana (by the settlements) in his grant of its exclusive commerce to Crozat. Three years subsequent to this, the Spanish establishment at Pensacola was formed, as well as the settlement of the Adais on the river Mexicana. After various conflicting efforts, on both sides, the bay and river Perdido was established, (from the peace of 1719) as the boundary between the French province of Louisiana on the one side and the Spanish province of Florida on the other: this river being nearly equi-distant between Mobile and Pensacola. Near the close of the war between England and France, rendered memorable for the unexampled success with which it was conducted by that unrivalled statesman the great Lord Chatham, Spain became a party on the side of France. The loss of the Havana, and other important dependencies, was the immediate consequence. In 1762, France, by a secret treaty of contemporaneous date with the preliminary Treaty of Peace, relinquished Louisiana to Spain, as an indemnity for her losses, sustained by advocating the cause of France. By the definitive Treaty of 1763, France ceded to England all that part of Louisiana which lies east of the Mississippi except the island of New Orleans—the rest of the province to Spain. It is to be observed that although France ostensibly ceded this country to England, virtually the cession was on the part of Spain; because France was no longer interested in the business, but as the friend of Spain, (having previously relinquished the whole to her,) and, because in 1783 restitution was made by England, not to France, but to Spain, England having acquired this portion of Louisiana, together with the Spanish province of Florida, annexed to the former that part of Florida which lies west of the Apalachicola and east of the Perdido; thereby forming the province of West Florida.

It is only in English geography, and during this period, from 1763 to 1783, that such a country as West Florida is known. For Spain, having acquired both the Floridas in 1783, re-annexed to Louisiana the country west of the Perdido subject to the government of New Orleans, and established the ancient boundaries of Florida; the country between the Perdido and Apalachicola being subject to the Governor of St. Augustine. By the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, Spain cedes to France "the province of Louisiana with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain:" viz. to the Perdido, "and that it had when France possessed it" to the Perdido—and such as it should be after treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other Powers:" that is, saving to the United States the country given up by the Treaty of San Lorenzo. We have succeeded to all the right of France. If the navigation of the Mississippi alone were of sufficient importance to justify war, surely the possession of every drop of water which runs into it—the exclusion of European nations from its banks, who would have with us the same causes of quarrel, did we possess New Orleans only, which we have had with the former possessors of that key of the river; the entire command of the Mobile and its widely extended branches, scarcely inferior in consequence to the Mississippi itself—watering the finest country and affording the best navigation in the United States—surely these would be acknowledged to be inestimably valuable.

But it is dreaded that so widely extended a country cannot subsist under a Republican Government. If this dogma be indisputable, I fear we have already far exceeded the limits which visionary speculatists have supposed capable of free Government. This argument, so far as it goes, would prove that instead of acquiring we ought to divest ourselves of territory. If the extent of the Republics of Greece, or Switzerland, of ancient or modern times, is to be our standard, we shall dwindle indeed. They have formed the basis of most theories on this subject. The acquisition of the country west of the Mississippi does not reduce us to the necessity of settling it now, or for a long time to come. It will tend to destroy the cause of Indian wars, whilst it may constitute the asylum of that brave and injured race of men.

Mr. R. concluded by apologizing for detaining the Committee so long. He was sorry that he had been unable to compress his remarks into a smaller compass.

Mr. J. Lewis said, that, on a question so important, it was proper that his vote should be accompanied by his reasons. With the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) he entertained doubts as to the constitutionality of the treaty; and if those doubts should be removed, he should vote for carrying it into effect. The part of the treaty to which he referred was in the seventh article, in the following words:

"As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations, for a limited time, in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on, it has been agreed between the contracting parties, that the French ships coming directly from France or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce and manufactures of France or her said colonies; and the ships of Spain coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted during the space of twelve years in the port of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry, within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandise, or other or greater tonnage, than that paid by the citizens of the United States."

In opposition to this part of the treaty, he found in the Constitution of the United States this declaration: "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

It was on this point that he entertained doubts, which he wished might be removed. His honorable colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) had not removed them: so far from removing, he had confirmed them.

Mr. L. was free to declare that his only objections were as to the unconstitutionality of the treaty; and should any gentleman remove them, he would not object to voting for carrying the treaty into operation; but, unless they were removed, he must vote against it.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in explanation, said that he thought he had suggested that the preference referred to was a legal and not a Constitutional difficulty.

Mr. LEWIS—Still the gentleman has not removed my difficulty. Congress possess no power to give a commercial preference to one State over another; and if the ships of France and Spain are permitted to enter New Orleans on terms more advantageous than they are permitted to enter other ports of the United States, it is a palpable violation of the Constitution.

The gentleman from Virginia has also told us that this preference is to be considered as the price paid for the ceded territory. I am astonished at this observation. As I understand the treaty, we are to take possession of Louisiana within three months from the ratification of the treaty; and as soon as taken into our possession, a specific sum is to be paid for it, which being done it becomes our sole property. If then we give a great advantage to the port of New Orleans, not enjoyed by other ports, I say such preference will be a palpable violation of the Constitution. For it must be evident to every mind that such a preference will operate against every State in the Union. For if the ships of France and Spain are permitted to enter New Orleans upon better terms than any other ports, they can afford to bring the productions of those countries into New Orleans much cheaper than into any other ports of the United States. These are my only objections; if removed I shall have no difficulties; but until they are removed, I must be opposed to the resolution before the Committee.

Mr. GRIFFIN said that upon a subject so important, and so deeply interesting to his country, it would be unpardonable in him, and evince a dereliction of duty, to give a vote without assigning his reasons. On referring to the Treaty and the Constitution, and comparing their provisions, considerable apprehension had arisen in his mind; and he seriously feared the consequences of a collision between them. As he was only in search of truth, and as it was his sincere wish that all his apprehensions and doubts should be removed, he would take the liberty of stating his doubts on the constitutionality of the treaty.

In the 7th article of the treaty were these words, [quoting the words recited by the last speaker, as above stated.] This was evidently a commercial regulation. If a commercial regulation, and such he deemed it, the President and Senate have undertaken to form commercial regulations for the ceded territory.

In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, power is given to Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Is not, then, this treaty stipulation, made by the President and the Senate, in direct contravention of this Constitutional investiture of Congress? The Constitution says, "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Who are Congress? The Senate and House of Representatives. If, then, the President and Senate make a treaty for the regulation of commerce, they infringe the Constitution, by doing that which Congress alone can do. Thus, then, have the President and Senate, in their Executive capacity, legislated, and thereby infringed the rights of this House, as a branch of the Legislature.

In the same seventh article of the treaty, we find that "French ships coming directly from France, or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce and manufactures of France or her said colonies; and the ships of Spain coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted during the space of twelve years in the port of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandise, or other or greater tonnage than that paid by the citizens of the United States."

In the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, we find, "No preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." He was correct, he believed, in stating, that, under the present regulations of trade, Spanish vessels pay fifty cents per ton, while American vessels paid only six cents. Here, then, the President and Senate undertake to destroy this provision made by law. For, according to the treaty, Spanish and French vessels entering the ports of New Orleans will hereafter pay only six cents a ton, while similar vessels coming to all the other ports of the United States will be obliged to pay fifty cents a ton. The difference between six and fifty constitutes the preference given to New Orleans.

Feeling these doubts most forcibly, he could not consent to give his approbation to the resolution until they were completely removed. He did not feel a disposition to discuss the merits of the treaty, or to go at large into the consequences which it might produce. He did, however, fear those consequences; he feared the effects of the vast extent of our empire; he feared the effects of the increased value of labor, the decrease in the value of lands, and the influence of climate upon our citizens who should migrate thither. He did fear (though this land was represented as flowing with milk and honey) that this Eden of the New World would prove a cemetery for the bodies of our citizens.

Mr. PURVIANCE.—I am clearly and decidedly in favor of the resolution on your table, premising the appropriations for carrying the treaty between France and this country into effect; and I sincerely regret, that in doing so, I shall act adversely to the general sentiment of the gentlemen with whom it is my pleasure and my pride to confess I have hitherto politically officiated.

It is true I am, and always have been, opposed to the general tenor of the present Administration. It has not appeared to me to possess that bold commanding aspect—that erect and resolute front—which ought to be assumed by the Executive of a free people, when claiming satisfaction for a wrong sustained. It has not shown that strong, muscular, athletic shape, which is calculated to intimidate aggression, or which is enabled to resist it; nor do I think that it has manifested that firm, dignified, manly tone of virtue and of spirit, which, resting on the love of a free people, and conscious of their strength, can ask for the prompt, direct, and unequivocal satisfaction to which it is entitled, and, being denied, can take it. It has not appeared like the veteran chief, ready to gird his loins in defence of his country's rights; but, if I may be allowed to use the magna componere parvis, it has, to my mind, somewhat resembled a militia subaltern, who, in time of war, directed his men not to fire on the enemy, lest the enemy might fire again.

Under such an Administration, I have thought that it would be better to have the ceded territory on any terms than not to have it at all. If we have not the spirit or the means of doing ourselves justice, would it not be better that we bribe those who might be in a situation to molest us, and thus put it out of their power to do us any injury, which we cannot or which we will not avenge? There are but two ways of maintaining our national independence—men and money. Since we did not use the first, we must have recourse to the last. One of these two we should be compelled to resort to if France gained possession of Louisiana, and we had better resort to it now. I deny that they have as yet gained possession: they have not received a delivery of the four redoubts which garrison and command the country, nor have they a single armed soldier there, except those which are particularly attached to the equipage of the Colonial Prefect. If, sir, we were obliged to resort to the necessity of purchasing their friendship, after they had procured an establishment, it would not be confined to one instance of humiliation and acknowledgment on our part, or one instance of insult only on theirs. If we purchase this friendship once, we should be compelled to make annual contributions to their avarice, and be annually subjected to their insolence. Repeated concessions would only produce a repetition of injury, and, at last, when we had completely compromised our national dignity, and offered up our last cent as an oblation to Gallic rapacity, we would then be further from conciliation than ever. The spirit of universal domination, instead of being allayed by those measures which had been intended for its abatement, would rage with redoubled fury. Elated by those sacrifices which had been intended to appease it, it would still grow more fierce; it would soon stride across the Mississippi, and every encroachment which conquest or cunning could effect might be expected. The tomahawk of the savage and the knife of the negro would confederate in the league, and there would be no interval of peace, until we should either be able to drive them from their location altogether, or else offer up our sovereignty as an homage of our respect, and permit the name of our country to be blotted out of the list of nations forever.

I confess there are many gentlemen of that nation for whom I entertain the sincerest esteem; but although I love some of them as friends, they will pardon me when I say that I do not like all of them as neighbors. Blood, havoc, and devastation, have for some years past encircled their proximity, and circumstances equally disastrous and equally improbable have already taken place. Do we want any evidences of this? We can find them in Switzerland, in Italy, in Egypt, in Hanover, in France itself. We have seen the ancient throne of the Capets tumbled from its base; we have seen the tide of succession which had flowed on uninteruptedly for ages dammed up for ever; we have seen the sources of the life blood royal drained dry. And by whom? By the pert younglings of the day.

“An eagle towering in his pride of flight
Was, by a mousing owl, hawked at and killed.”

We have afterwards seen these puny upstarts, when their hands had been reddened in the slaughter-pens of Paris, kicked from their seats and a Corsican soldier embellished with the majesty of the Bourbons. We have seen one half of the Old World subjected to his dominion, and the other half alarmed at his power. And is it thought, sir, that America alone, with an army scarcely sufficient to defend our garrisons, with a navy scarcely sufficient to punish a Bashaw, with a treasury incommensurate to our engagements, and an Executive unwilling to strain our energies—is it, I say sir, for America alone, under these circumstances, singly to withstand that gigantic nation, fighting on her own ground, fed from her own granaries, and furnished from her own arsenals? The time once was, indeed, when we could have redressed our own wrongs, and had an opportunity of doing so; but that necessity and that opportunity, I take it sir, have now both passed away.

Yes, thank God! We have now a treaty, signed by themselves, in which they have voluntarily passed away the only means of annoyance which they possessed. But I do not thank the honorable gentleman who is at the head of our Executive. At the time this negotiation was commenced there could not be the smallest hope of its being carried into effect. The French Consul had obtained it perhaps for the express purpose of carrying into effect his favorite scheme of universal domination; it might give him the chance of injuring the British, controlling the Spaniards, and dismembering America. Compared with these objects a handful of bank stock was of no more consequence to him than a handful of sand. His fleet and army were ready to sail, and his colonial prefect had already arrived. But, mark! The King of Great Britain, who at this crisis I take to have been by far the most able negotiator we had, declares war. The scene is now changed. That which France had refused to our intercessions, she was now compelled to grant from mere necessity. A state of warfare took place about the last of March, and the treaty was signed soon afterwards. As long as I retain the small stock of understanding which it has pleased God to give me, I shall never be induced to believe, that it was owing in the smallest degree to the efficacy of diplomatic representation. The mind of that great man is not made of such soft materials as to receive an impress from the collision of every gentle hand. Stern, collected, and inflexible, he laughs to scorn the toying arts of persuasion; his soul is a stupendous rock, which the rushing of mighty waters cannot shake from its place. No, sir; had it not been for this happy coincidence of circumstances, the personal solicitations of our Ministers would have been regarded with as listless an ear as if they had been whispered across the ocean.

But, sir, whatever may have been the causes which produced this treaty, whether it was owing to diplomatic agency, or to fortuitous incidents, its effects will certainly prevent an evil, if it does not produce a good. I do not think that there will be any positive advantage resulting from the sale of unlocated lands, as has to-day been hinted. On this score we need not expect a reimbursement; there is no doubt but that all the valuable lands contained within the circumscriptions of the Territory have already been granted by the Courts of Spain and France to their own subjects; nor do I see any restrictive provision in the treaty which would prevent the latter from continuing to issue patents up to very date of the ratification.

There may, however, be other advantages, or there may indeed be disadvantages, which, shrouded as I am in the gloom of uncertainty, and not possessing the intelligence which has been asked for and withheld, I am unable to discern. To gentlemen who have been pleased to prevent our procuring it, these circumstances may be obvious, as they are more eminently situated they perhaps command a larger and a clearer prospect. If then the claim which has been transferred should be invested with any latent embarrassment; if the Court of Madrid has already signified any hostility to this treaty, in consequence of the non-performance of the stipulations contained in that or St. Ildefonso, respecting the recognition of the late King of Etruria; if our possession should be opposed, or our right of property hereafter contested, let the President look to it. He only will become responsible for every drop of American blood which may be drawn in such a contest, as he ought to have communicated any information to this effect which he possessed, in order that our discretion might be regulated accordingly.

As no such obstacles have been made known to us by the President, I will suppose that none such do exist, and I will, therefore, vote for the treaty; and even if a larger sum were necessary for its execution I would not withhold my assent, for the same reason that a man would give an exorbitant price for a piece of land adjoining his own, in order to prevent the settlement of a disorderly neighbor, who he thought would plunder his property or burn his enclosures; and, if this was the last public act of my life, I would sink into the grave under the pleasing impression that it was perhaps the best.

MR. ELLIOT.—Mr. Chairman, although in the short time since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, I have several times risen in debate, that circumstance scarcely diminishes my diffidence at the present moment. Uneducated in the schools, and unpractised in the arts, of parliamentary eloquence, it is with no inconsiderable degree of diffidence that I rise upon the present occasion. There are occasions, however, where even the eye of timidity should sparkle with confidence; and there are questions in the discussion of which the finger should be removed from the lip of silence herself. And such is every occasion and every question involving the existence, the infraction, or even the correct and just construction of that Constitution which is the palladium of our privileges, and the temple of our glory. If I might be permitted to borrow a metaphorical expression from one of the most celebrated commanders of antiquity, who declared that he intended to spread all his sails on the ocean of war, I would say that it is with fear and trembling I presume to launch my little feeble bark on the vast ocean of eloquence and literature (pointing to the federal members) by which I am surrounded. If, however, the remark be just, that it is even sweet and glorious to die for one's country, surely the humbler sacrifice of native diffidence may with propriety be expected and exacted from a juvenile American Representative.

Whatever minuter shades or minor differences of opinion may exist among the American people, there is one point in which we shall all meet with cordial unanimity. We all unite in an ardent devotion to the Constitution. He who is not devoted to it is unworthy of the honorable name of an American. I lament that it is necessary to speak particularly of myself; but duty, not only to myself, but to my constituents, a numerous and respectable section of the American people, demands it. It may be objected to me, and with truth, that there was a time when I professed sentiments hostile to some of the most important provisions in the Constitution. It was not, however, at the time when the Constitution was submitted to the people. I was then in infancy and obscurity, deprived of the means, and even of the hopes of education. I had yet read much and reflected more. My ardent and excursive eye had wandered rapidly over the wide field of ancient history; I thought I beheld my country, like the Roman Republic in the age of Cato, the sport of every wind and of every wave. As far as I understood the Constitution, I admired it and wished for its adoption. But when an elegant anonymous writer predicted, as the consequence of its adoption, that "liberty would be but a name, to adorn the short historic page of the halcyon days of America," I trembled and shuddered for the possible consequences. If in the plenitude of juvenile self-sufficiency (and who has not been young?) I have since fancied that I could form a more perfect constitution, that dream of the imagination has long been past. I have long been sincerely and ardently attached to the Constitution.

I foresee that I shall be led into a wide field, and that I shall long, too long, occupy the attention of the Committee. Will the Committee hear me? I imagine that I read a favorable answer in the countenances of all its members. I shall be interrupted by no unpleasant indications of impatience, by no loud calls for the question.

The treaty before us is of an immense consequence, and my attention was early turned to the subject. From the moment of my election, I have devoted many studious and laborious hours to the subjects connected with it, and I have anticipated all the objections against it; none of those presented this day by the gentleman from New York, who opened the debate, or by the gentlemen who followed him on the same side, have struck my mind as novel. The question of the constitutionality of the treaty first presents itself. It is said to be unconstitutional, because it enlarges the territory of the United States. To reduce the arguments of gentlemen on this head to syllogistic form, they would not strike the mind with great force. The Constitution is silent on the subject of the acquisition of territory. By the treaty we acquire territory; therefore the treaty is unconstitutional. It has been well remarked by an eminent civilian, that those are not the most correct and conclusive reasoners who are very expert at their quicquids, their atquis, and their ergos; but those, who, from correct premises, by just reasoning, deduce correct conclusions. This question is not to be determined from a mere view of the Constitution itself, although it may be considered as admitted that it does not prohibit in express terms, the acquisition of territory. It is a rule of law, that in order to ascertain the import of a contract, the evident intention of the parties, at the time of forming it, is principally to be regarded. This rule will apply, as it respects the present question, to our Constitution, of which it may be said, as the great Dr. Johnson said of the science of the law, that it is the last result of human wisdom acting upon human experience. The Constitution is a compact between the American people for certain great objects expressed in the preamble, [Mr. E. here read the preamble,] in language to which eloquence and learning can add no force or weight. Previous to the formation of this Constitution there existed certain principles of the law of nature and nations, consecrated by time and experience, in conformity to which the Constitution was formed. The question before us, I have always believed, must be decided upon the laws of nations alone; and under this impression I have examined the works of the most celebrated authors on that subject.

I recollect a time, sir, when a foreign Minister in this country, at a moment when genius, fancy, and ardent patriotism, were lords of the ascendant over learning, wisdom, and experience, spoke of the law of nations and its principles as mere worm-eaten authorities, and aphorisms of Vattel and others. I also recollect that the illustrious man, who is now President of the United States, was then Secretary of State, and that he delivered the unanimous sentiments of the American people when, in his reply to that Minister, he observed that something more than mere sarcasms of that kind was necessary to disprove those authorities and principles; and that, until they were disproved, the American nation would hold itself bound by them. This is the man, sir, who has been so injuriously calumniated within these walls this morning, and upon whom such a torrent of bitter eloquence has been poured by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PURVIANCE); a gentleman who is himself a model of eloquence, uniting all the excellencies of Cicero and Demosthenes, and all other orators, ancient and modern.

The American people, in forming their Constitution, had an eye to that law of nations, which is deducible by natural reason and established by common consent, to regulate the intercourse and concerns of nations. With a view to this law the treaty-making power was constituted, and by virtue of this law, the Government, and the people of the United States, in common with all other nations, possess the power and right of making acquisitions of territory by conquest, cession, or purchase. Indeed the gentlemen who deny us the right of acquiring by purchase, would probably allow us to keep the territory, were it obtained by conquest.

Colonies, or provinces, are a part of the eminent domain of the nation possessing them, and of course are national property; colonial territory may be transferred from one nation to another by purchase; this purchase can be effected by treaty alone, as nations do not, like individuals, execute deeds, and cause them to be recorded in public offices; that department of the Government of the nation purchasing, which possesses the treaty-making power generally, is competent to make treaties for that purpose. These positions are established by the laws of nations, and are applicable to the case before us. [Here Mr. E. read a variety of extracts from Vattel to establish these positions, and observed that they were corroborated by Grotius, Puffendorf, and other eminent writers on the law of nature and nations, whose works he had consulted.]

A mere recapitulation, and that not a tedious one, of these principles and authorities, will now answer the present purpose. Colonies have always been considered as national property, although the law or practice of nations, in this instance, may not conform to the law of nature. Greece treated her colonies with peculiar indulgence: Rome considered any privileges which her's were suffered to possess, as mere matters of grace, not of right. The one was a natural and tender parent, the other a cruel stepmother. Yet I have no recollection that the Grecian colonies in Asia Minor, Italy, or even at Ionia, were represented in the Amphycionian Council, the General Assembly of the States of Greece. The claim of the British Colonies, which now constitute the United States, to be represented in that body by which they were taxed, though just in itself, was novel and unwarranted by the practice of nations. Thank God the claim was successful, and in consequence of it, we are now here as the representatives of the American people, deliberating upon their most important interests. It is unnecessary to reiterate the other positions; they are undeniable in themselves, and their applicability to the present case will hardly be disputed. If the treaty be extremely pernicious, or has not been made by sufficient authority, or has been made for unjust purposes, it is void by the laws of nations.

Another ground of objection to the constitutionality of the treaty is taken. It is said that a clause of the Constitution which forbids any preference, as to duties and privileges, being given to the ports of one State over those of another, is irreconcilable with the seventh article of the treaty, by which "it is agreed between the contracting parties, that the French ships coming directly from France or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of France or her said colonies; and the ships of Spain coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted during the space of twelve years in the ports of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States, coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on the merchandise, or other or greater tonnage, than that paid by the citizens of the United States." Let us again inquire with what views, and for what objects, the Constitution was formed. The articles of Confederation were but a feeble band of union, the "shadow of a shade," to borrow a poetical expression, of a federal system. Several States, sovereign and independent with respect to many objects, united under a national Government as it respected the most important national objects, and formed a federal system, novel in its nature, and unequalled in the annals of all ages and nations. The States as such were equal, and intended to preserve that equality; and the provision of the Constitution alluded to, was calculated to prevent Congress from making any odious discriminations or distinctions between particular States. "No preference shall be given to the ports of one State." It was not contemplated that this provision would have application to colonial or territorial acquisitions. But it is said that the treaty obliges us to receive the inhabitants of the ceded territory into the Union, and of course to form them into new States. By the treaty, "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." This stipulation of the treaty is of a novel, singular, and curious nature, but does not diminish my zeal to have it carried into effect. A complete discretion is left to the United States as to the time and manner of admission, and I have no idea that it will be necessary to admit them within the twelve years during which France and Spain are to enjoy those privileges. The eloquent and honorable member from Virginia (Mr. R.) took a very different view of this subject, which of itself was perfectly satisfactory to my mind, and I could take still other views equally satisfactory. There can be no possible violation of the Constitution.

The expediency of the treaty is another question, and an important one. I once hoped that the interests of our country would never require an extension of its limits, and I regret even that that necessity now exists. Evils and dangers may be apprehended from this source, and great evils and dangers may possibly result. But the regions of possibility are illimitable; those of probability are marked by certain well defined boundaries, obvious to all men of reason and reflection, and, in the language of the poet,

"As broad and obvious to the passing clown,
As to the letter'd sage's curious eye."

If we cannot find, in the peculiar principles of our form of Government, and in the virtue and intelligence of our citizens, a sufficient security against the dangers from a widely extended territory, in vain shall we seek it elsewhere. There is no magical quality in a degree of latitude or longitude, a river or a mountain. And it has been well remarked, that every danger from this quarter might have been apprehended before the acquisition of this territory. The Roman Empire, or that of Alexander in the zenith of its glory, was scarcely capable of containing a greater population than the territory of the United States; and men conversant with history do not wonder at the transient existence and rapid ruin of those empires. I repeat it, Mr. Chairman, we must look for our security in principles and circumstances inapplicable to the ancient nations. With the present question of expediency, I confess, sir, are naturally intermingled many considerations, infinitely interesting to the future peace, prosperity, felicity, and glory of our beloved country. The physical strength of a nation depends upon an aggregation of circumstances, amongst which, compactness of population, as well as territory, may be reckoned; our population may become too scattered; but this too is only a possible event. These possible evils ought not to be put in competition with the certain advantage which we derive from the acquisition.

But a gentleman tells us that the Administration hold out to us an Eden of the western world, a land flowing with milk and honey, while they have obtained nothing but a dreary and barren wilderness. Perhaps, if the gentleman be correct, the acquisition is scarcely the less important. To demonstrate the advantages of this purchase, it is not necessary to describe Louisiana as an Elysian region—to describe it, as Homer does the Fortunate Islands, a region, on whose auspicious climate even Winter smiles, where no bleak wind blows from its mountains, and no gale is felt but the zephyr, diffusing health and pleasure. But from geographical information, defective as it is, and from reasonable analogies, we may conclude that, with the exception of some considerable tracts, it is a country fertile and salubrious. Geography points us to China, Persia, India, Arabia Felix, and Japan, countries situated in corresponding latitudes, which, though always overshadowed by the horrid gloom of despotism, are always productive, and teaches us by analogy that Louisiana, in natural fertility, is probably equal to those beautiful oriental regions.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PURVIANCE) says, he shall vote for carrying the treaty into effect, because the possession of the territory is important, and the Administration not having, as it ought to have done, made use of men to obtain it, he will consent to make use of money. He has applied many curious epithets to the Administration. He wishes for an Administration athletic and muscular, meaning, I suppose, like the wrestlers in the Grecian circus, or the gladiators in that of Rome. When I came within these walls, sir, I ardently hoped that the voice of party would be silent during the discussion of this subject, and I did not expect to hear the Administration attacked in the language of vulgarity, malignity, and factious fury. When it is thus assailed, shall its defenders be silent? During the last session of Congress, an extraordinary degree of agitation was produced in the public mind by an egregious violation of our rights by an officer of the Spanish Government. Neither the people nor the Government were deficient in that spirit which the gentleman extols, but they were not governed by false ideas of national honor, and they were acquainted with the law of nations; they knew that we had no right to make the denunciatio belli precede the repetitio rerum—a declaration of war precede a demand of justice. Other epithets which the gentleman applies to his favorite Administration I believe justly belong to the present one; bold, firm, intrepid, manly, virtuous, spirited; it is owing to its wise and temperate conduct that we are not now engaged in the horrors of war, and it has erected an immortal monument to its own glory. Yet we hear of malicious subaltern, and the epithet cowardly—

Mr. PURVIANCE here interrupted, and observed that he did not use those expressions.

Mr. ELLIOT proceeded.—I wrote them down the moment the gentleman uttered them, and I could not understand them otherwise than as intended to have at least a remote application to the President of the United States; I hope the gentleman had no such intention. That we did not go to war, though peculiarly happy for our country, was probably unfortunate for that gentleman, as, in that event, he might have displayed, at the head of a triumphant army, those military talents which he undoubtedly possesses in an equal degree with his oratorical powers.

I must remark upon another extraordinary part of that extraordinary speech. Was it politic, was it prudent, was it just, at a moment when such an important negotiation between the French and American Governments was closing, for a Representative of the American people to labor to irritate the French, or any portion of our own people, by ardent declamation against what is called the unbounded ambition and rapacity of the French Consul? That gentleman has told us what his great predecessor, but not equal in eloquence, Edmund Burke, told us long ago, that “the age of chivalry is gone.” But why turn our attention at this moment to Switzerland, to Italy, to Hanover, the bloody scenes of revolutionary France herself? He deplores the fate of the royal Capets, devoted to destruction by the pert younglings of a day. If the French revolution has been unsuccessful, if the hopes of the friends of man and liberty have not been gratified, if the whole Eastern world is still to groan under the iron hand of despotism, is it a subject of such deep regret that a gleam of light has darted athwart the horrid gloom; that we have for a time anticipated, though we have failed to realize, the blessings of extended liberty? It is rather a subject of pleasure, and gratitude to Heaven. The First Consul is styled a Corsican usurper. I believe, sir, that there is not within these walls an admirer of the present Government of France. But we all know the distinction between a King or Government de jure and de facto. If Bonaparte be not the rightful ruler of the French Republic, he is the actual possessor of the powers of Government, and can bind the nation by treaties. If the Bonapartian shall have followed the Capetian race to the regions of the tomb, when the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty shall reach Paris, it will not be the less obligatory upon the French nation.

The gentleman to whom I have so often alluded denies all merit to the President and the American negotiators, and says that the King of Great Britain was our only meritorious and successful negotiator. Without attributing to the President the powers of prophecy, I must hazard the opinion that, in common with all philosophic politicians, he foresaw that the peace between France and Great Britain would not be permanent. The elements of war were mingled with those of peace.

[Mr. SANFORD rose, and Mr. ELLIOT giving way, Mr. S. inquired of the Chairman, whether any rule existed by which members in Committee of the Whole could be required to keep closely to the point in discussion? The Chairman, Mr. DAWSON, replied, that it had not been customary, in Committee, to confine gentlemen to narrow limits in their remarks.]

Mr. ELLIOT concluded as follows: I had determined, sir, on the first unequivocal manifestation of impatience by any member, immediately to close my observations. I acknowledge that I have imperceptibly occupied more than my share of the valuable time of the Committee. But I had not quite done with the gentleman from North Carolina. I have paid him some compliments as an orator, perhaps more than were due to the merit of his oration, or the character of its author. I allude only to his political character; his private character, so far as I have information of it, I highly respect; but the political part which he acted this day was to me so extraordinary and astonishing, that I could not restrain the expression of my feelings. To other gentlemen on his side of the House, I look for real eloquence and ingenious argument. And although the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) from the display of his powers this day, may safely trust his fame as an orator to the impartial voice of history and posterity, in competition with any orator on the other side of the House, yet I am not without my fears, from former specimens of the talents of gentlemen in the opposition, that we shall one day be swept away in the overwhelming tide of their eloquence. The friends of the present Administration can behold, with emotions only of pity, mixed with contempt, the innumerable little, muddy, murmuring rills of faction, folly, and slander, which, like spots upon the orb of day, are scattered upon the fair scenery of our far extended country. But they are compelled to listen, with a loftiness of feeling bordering on sublimity and not unmingled with terror, to the awful roaring of that tremendous torrent of opposition eloquence which resounds within these walls, thunders around the Capitol, terrifies the Administration, and makes even the Republican system itself tremble to its centre.

Mr. CLAIBORNE urged the propriety of coming to an immediate decision, declaring his conviction of the constitutionality and expediency of the treaty.

Mr. THATCHER moved that the Committee should rise.

Motion lost, without a division.

Mr. SANFORD did not rise to make a display of his talents. Those who had confided to him the representation of their interests could have no such expectations, as they had unfortunately selected a plain Western farmer. He was sorry to see so much time wasted. He begged the House would recollect the time within which it was necessary to pass laws for carrying the treaty into effect. Much has been said of a breach of the Constitution; but has any man shown it? The Constitution does not prohibit the powers exercised on this occasion; and not having prohibited them, they must be considered as possessed by Government. In his opinion, it was necessary to carry the treaty into immediate effect. This done, other measures would require attention which would afford an ample harvest for the talents and eloquence of gentlemen with which, on any other occasion, he would be highly pleased.

Mr. THATCHER was sorry to be obliged, at this late hour, to state his reasons for voting against the resolution; but he should not discharge his duty to his constituents, were he to refrain from expressing his ideas. These reasons he should state as briefly as possible. This resolution is general, and contemplates two objects; it calls for the occupation and government of Louisiana, and for an appropriation of fifteen millions of dollars. He had hoped that, on a question of such national importance, they would have been allowed the papers necessary for its elucidation. But gentlemen have denied us this privilege. As the question, whether the treaty should be carried into effect, is a great Constitutional question, I shall in my remarks confine myself to the Constitutional objections against the treaty. Two objections have been made arising from the 3d and 7th articles of the treaty.

The third provides that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

I conceive, said Mr. T., that the only sound doctrine is, not that which has been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. SANFORD,) that whatever power is not prohibited by the Constitution is agreeable to it, but that such powers as are not given are still held by the States or the people. No arguments have been addressed to prove that the Constitution delegates such a power. The gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. ELLIOT,) who has gratified us with so long and flowery a speech, and who has ransacked Vattel, and various other eminent authors on the laws of nations, has proved that where the United States have a right to make a treaty, a treaty may be made. But these authorities do not apply unless he prove that the Constitution gives the powers exercised in the present instance. The Confederation under which we now live is a partnership of States, and it is not competent to it to admit a new partner but with the consent of all the partners. If such power exist, it does not reside in the President and Senate. The Constitution says new States may be admitted by Congress. If this article of the Constitution authorizes the exercise of power under the treaty, it must reside with the Legislature, and not with the President and Senate.

H. OF R.

The Louisiana Treaty.

OCTOBER, 1803.

The gentleman from Virginia says, the principle contained in the third article of the treaty has been already recognised by Congress, and has instanced our treaties with Spain and Great Britain respecting the adjustment of our limits. By adverting to these treaties, it will be seen that there was then no pretence that we had acquired new territory. They only establish our lines agreeably to the Treaty of Peace. Certainly then the facts are not similar, and there exists no analogy of reasoning between the two cases. The gentleman from Virginia asks whether we could not purchase the right of deposit at New Orleans? But the argument meant to be conveyed in this question does not apply. We had the right before this treaty was formed; nor did we, in consequence of that right, undertake to admit the people of New Orleans into the Union.

Gentlemen say, we were for going to war during the last session, for the purpose of acquiring new territory. Mr. T. knew the gentlemen with whom he generally acted, asserted on that occasion the right of the United States to the deposit at New Orleans, and were, in defence of that right, ready to go to war if necessary. But he had never heard that it was intended to hold that right in perpetuity; he believed it was only contemplated to hold it as a pledge until our right should be restored, and indemnity rendered for our injuries.

It is said that the preference given in the treaty to Spanish and French vessels is to be considered as part of the purchase money. But will gentlemen say it was a part of the purchase money when it is applied as well to Spanish as French vessels, though the purchase is altogether made of France? For these reasons it is, that the gentleman from Virginia has not convinced my mind respecting the constitutionality of this power. If it is not expressly delegated, I must hold that it is still retained by the States or the people. I believe, also, that the power now contended for by gentlemen implies the power of alienating a part of the United States, and that we might as constitutionally alienate Massachusetts and annex it to the British Provinces; for these rights of annexation of new territory and alienation of old must go together; and I shall not be surprised hereafter, if this treaty shall go into effect, at Massachusetts or Vermont being annexed to the British Provinces. Under color of this power, a large portion of the Union may be annexed to some European Kingdom, so as totally to change the principles of our Government.

So far as the provisions of this treaty affected the Eastern States, it bore hard upon their interests. The Constitution says, "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." Now, if this territory shall be annexed to the United States, New Orleans will have a decided preference over all the other ports of the Union, inasmuch as the vessels of Spain and France entering that port will have to pay no higher duties than are demanded of our own vessels. The consequence will be, that the ships of Spain and France will come in, and supply not only New Orleans but all the country bordering on the Mississippi and the Ohio. What will be the consequence of this to the Eastern States, which the gentleman from Virginia has so handsomely complimented? If they possess a spirit of enterprise, it ought to be encouraged; instead of that, the effect of this treaty will be, that they must bring their goods from Europe to their own ports, and then carry them to New Orleans; by which freight and insurance will be greatly increased; and these charges will enable the French and Spanish vessels to monopolise the carrying trade. But it is said, this is not a Constitutional, but a legal provision. Now, if I can understand the obligations imposed by the Constitution, every department of the Government is bound by it. I conceive that the President and Senate in making treaties, as well as the Legislature in making laws, are bound by it. However great gentlemen may imagine the benefits of this treaty, they do not affect the Constitutional question. It was not therefore necessary to discuss the expediency of the measure, if unconstitutional; but as gentlemen had dressed these advantages in very alluring colors, it might not be improper to say that, if it went into effect, it would carry from its present centre a great portion of the population of the United States; would probably remove the seat of Government, and might dismember the Union.

Mr. T. was not disposed to discuss the causes which have produced the dismemberment of empires, though all history showed that great empires, whether monarchies or republics, had been ultimately broken to pieces by their magnitude.

This acquisition of distant territory, said Mr. T., will involve the necessity of a considerable standing army, so justly an object of terror. Do gentlemen flatter themselves that, by purchasing Louisiana, we are invulnerable? No, sir, Spain will still border on our Southern frontier; and so long as Spain occupies that country we are not secure from the attempts of another nation more warlike and ambitious.

Under these impressions it was impossible for him to vote for the resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH was sensible of the value of the time of the House, and would not, in the few remarks he should make, occupy five minutes. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) had misapprehended and misstated what he had previously observed. He had not said that the Constitutional question made by gentlemen was a mere legal injunction which that House might get rid of; but he had said that the preference of our ships over foreign ships was a legal regulation; and that, therefore, those gentlemen who were now so tender with regard to the Constitution, might have it in their power entirely to get rid of the Constitutional difficulty, by taking off from the ships of Spain and France such duties as were higher than the duties paid by American vessels. When I say this, said Mr. R., I speak for them, and not for myself; nor shall I move to take off these heavy duties, as I do not feel the force of the Constitutional objections urged by gentlemen. The article of the treaty, so often quoted, shows that no preference is given to one port over another. Yet, by turning to our statute books, it will be perceived that, at present, there are some ports entitled to benefits which other ports do not enjoy; that they are set apart for particular objects; and particularly for the entry of articles brought from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. According, therefore, to the doctrine of this day, this is a violation of the Constitution.

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

Mr. SMILES should not long detain the Committee. He differed with gentlemen on the Constitutional question; considering a right of annexing territory incidental to all Governments. If he were correct in this opinion, such a power was vested in some department of Government in the United States. That it was not vested in the States was clear, as they were expressly divested of the right. They were by the Constitution expressly divested of the right of forming treaties and making war. It could then reside in the General Government only. It was a position that could not be denied, that all societies possessed the right of self-protection. Let us then suppose that a nation unjustly attacked by another nation repels the hostility, and that the injured nation proves successful. Two things will result: the one, a right to indemnify for the injury received and the expense incurred; and the other, a right to future security by making such provisions as shall place it beyond the power of the aggressing nation in future time to repeat her injuries. If he was correct in these principles, and they were not disputed, the right of the United States to annex territory could not be contested, if that measure were connected with her future security. The right, indeed, was common to all nations, admitted by all, and denied by none.

Another Constitutional difficulty had been started, from the alleged obligation of the United States to incorporate this territory in the Union. Mr. S. wished gentlemen to attend to that part of the treaty which related to this point, and their difficulties would be removed. The treaty says:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

Now, where, said Mr. S., is the difficulty? We are obliged to admit the inhabitants according to the principles of the Constitution. Suppose those principles forbid their admission; then we are not obliged to admit them. This followed as an absolute consequence from the premises. There existed however a remedy for this case, if it should occur; for, if the prevailing opinion shall be that the inhabitants of the ceded territory cannot be admitted under the Constitution as it now stands, the people of the United States can, if they see fit, apply a remedy, by amending the Constitution so as to authorize their admission. And if they do not choose to do this, the inhabitants may remain in a colonial state.

Mr. CROWNSHIELD.—Mr. Chairman: I rise, sir, to correct the gentleman from North Carolina in one particular; he has stated that the First Consul of France signed the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States after the declaration of war by Great Britain against France. I believe he is mistaken, sir, for the Louisiana treaties were signed the 30th April, and Great Britain issued a declaration of war against France on the 17th of May. If I am right, the gentleman might have spared himself the trouble of detracting from the merits of the Executive on this great occasion.

Now I am up, I beg leave to state to the Committee some of the reasons why I shall give my vote in favor of the treaties.

A resolution is on the table which recommends that the provision ought to be made to carry into effect the late treaties with France, which cede Louisiana to the United States. Feeling as I do that we have acquired this country at a cheap price, that it is a necessary barrier in the Southern and Western quarters of the Union, that it offers immense advantages to us as an agricultural and commercial nation, I am highly in favor of the acquisition, and I shall most cordially give my vote in approbation of the resolution.

What, sir, shall we let slip this golden opportunity of acquiring New Orleans and the whole of Louisiana for the trifling sum of fifteen millions of dollars, when one-quarter part of the purchase money will be paid to our own citizens, and the remainder in public stock, which we are not obliged to redeem under fifteen years? I trust, sir, we shall not omit to seize the only means now left to us for getting a peaceable possession of the finest country in the world. The bargain is a good one, and considering it merely in that light, we ought not to relinquish it. I have no doubt that the country acquired is richly worth fifty millions of dollars, and it is my opinion that we ought not to hesitate a moment in passing the resolution on the table.

A gentleman from New York has started doubts respecting the privilege given in the seventh article to French and Spanish vessels coming directly from France and Spain, and their colonies, and loaded only with their produce and manufactures, to trade to ports in the ceded territory for twelve years upon the same terms as American or native ships coming directly from France and Spain. I have no objection to that article of the treaty; those vessels are to pay a tonnage duty, and a duty on their cargoes similar to our own; they are not to be admitted free of duty, but the United States reserve the right to make any regulations concerning the exportation of the produce and merchandise of our own country which may be thought necessary.

Our trading ships can easily contend against those of France and Spain in the ports of Louisiana. I should be very sorry that American vessels could not meet those of any other nation in all situations and in every country, where they may be received on equal conditions as it respects the duties. We actually build cheaper, and can navigate cheaper than any other nation on the globe; and of course we run no risk in contending with other vessels in the open market; and I flatter myself we shall soon see all foreign vessels driven from those ports by an honorable competition with them.

It surely cannot be unconstitutional to receive the ships of France or Spain in the ports of the new territory upon any terms whatever; it is a mere condition of the purchase, and this House may or may not agree to it; being a commercial regulation, we have the power to give our assent or dissent to the article in question, for I hold it to be correct doctrine, that the House, by the Constitution, have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, as well as with the Indian tribes; and that whenever the President and Senate make a treaty involving any commercial points, our consent is absolutely necessary to carry the treaty into effect.

By giving our assent we do not injure the rights of the other ports in the Atlantic States, as the privilege is extended only to ports in the ceded territory. I consider the Eastern States as particularly and deeply interested in the acquisition of Louisiana; it is true their ships already visit almost every port, but under many restrictions; and I wish to see them sailing on the Mississippi without any molestation or restraint.

Sir, I am in favor of adopting these treaties, and they shall have my hearty support.

There is no superiority granted to foreign vessels trading to Louisiana, it merely places them on an equal footing with our own ships in those ports, for a limited time. The difference of duties is only ten per cent. on the duty, and forty-four cents of tonnage; which difference of duties, I venture to say, have never given us but very trifling advantages in the intercourse of foreign nations with the United States.

We have now an opening for a free trade to New Orleans and Louisiana, which we never had before, and I hope we shall embrace it. Let us ratify the treaties, with all their provisions, and we shall see in less than three years that we have gained the greatest advantages in our commerce. I wish we may immediately proceed to adopt the resolution before the Committee.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD called for the reading of two resolutions which had been referred to the Committee of the Whole, and after the same had been read, he observed: That the two resolutions which had been read from the Chair explained, in some detail, the measures, with which the general resolution, for carrying into execution the treaties, was to be followed up. In deciding therefore, on the general resolution, it became necessary to keep in view the measures which were to result from it, that if we were not satisfied with these, we might give our votes accordingly. The second resolution declares that it is expedient to provide by law for governing the ceded territory; and if gentlemen are not prepared to do this, or to provide the stock contemplated by the first resolution, they cannot agree to the general proposition under immediate consideration.

Before entering however into a consideration of these points, I think it proper, said Mr. G., to say, that I have been one of those who have long felt the importance, to this country, of the free navigation of the Mississippi, and of a place of deposit at some place near the mouth of that river. I deem the enjoyment of that navigation and deposit indispensable to the prosperity of our Western brethren; and there are few sacrifices I would not cheerfully make, consistent with the Constitution, to place those important privileges and rights beyond the reach of foreign control. The opinion which I now express has been of long standing and has not been weakened by any events which have recently taken place. So fully was I impressed at the last session, with the importance of these claims, that I was persuaded very vigorous measures ought to have been adopted for vindicating and securing rights which had been grossly violated. But whilst I again repeat, that the importance of our rights on the Mississippi has not been diminished in my view, it is necessary to declare, that I can never consent to secure this object, however desirable and important, by means which shall set at defiance the Constitution of my country.

It may not be improper, said Mr. G., in this place, also to declare, that I have been one of those who have long believed that the power of making treaties belongs exclusively to the President, with the consent of the Senate, and that a treaty, when constitutionally made and ratified, becomes a law, and must be executed accordingly. But it is essential to the existence of a treaty that it should be consistent with the Constitution, in every respect—both as it regards the subject-matter, and the form of ratification. If a treaty is repugnant to the Constitution, either in the matter of which it treats or in the form of ratification, it cannot be considered, within the meaning of the Constitution, a treaty. It is not within the words of the Constitution, "made under the authority of the United States,"—it is a dead letter, and void. If it shall then be found, that the instrument under consideration, contains stipulations which the Constitution does not warrant, it will result, that it cannot be respected as a treaty; that Congress, so far from being bound to carry it into execution, are obliged, by their duty and their oaths, to support the Constitution, and to refuse their assent to laws which go to infringe this great charter of our Government.

Having made these preliminary remarks, and in some measure explained the general principles by which I shall consider it my duty to test the treaty, I will again call the attention of the Committee to those parts of the instrument which have been noticed by other gentlemen, and which have equally excited in my mind doubts of its constitutionality. The third article of the treaty is thus expressed.

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

By this article it is declared: "That the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens." It is, perhaps, somewhat difficult to ascertain the precise effect which it was intended to give the words which have been used in this stipulation. It is, however, clear, that it was intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the ceded territory into the Union, by the treaty itself, or to pledge the faith of the nation that such an incorporation should take place within a reasonable time. It is proper, therefore, to consider the question with a reference to both constructions.

It is, in my opinion, scarcely possible for any gentleman on this floor to advance an opinion that the President and Senate may add to the members of the Union by treaty whenever they please, or, in the words of this treaty, may "incorporate in the union of the United States" a foreign nation who, from interest or ambition, may wish to become a member of our Government. Such a power would be directly repugnant to the original compact between the States, and a violation of the principles on which that compact was formed. It has been already well observed that the union of the States was formed on the principle of a copartnership, and it would be absurd to suppose that the agents of the parties who have been appointed to execute the business of the compact, in behalf of the principals, could admit a new partner, without the consent of the parties themselves. And yet, if the first construction is assumed, such must be the case under this Constitution, and the President and Senate may admit at will any foreign nation into this copartnership without the consent of the States.

The Government of this country is formed by a union of States, and the people have declared, that the Constitution was established "to form a more perfect union of the United States." The United States here mentioned cannot be mistaken. They were the States then in existence, and such other new States as should be formed, within the then limits of the Union, conformably to the provisions of the Constitution. Every measure, therefore, which tends to infringe the perfect union of the States herein described, is a violation of the first sentiment expressed in the Constitution. The incorporation of a foreign nation into the Union, so far from tending to preserve the Union, is a direct inroad upon it; it destroys the perfect union contemplated between the original parties by interposing an alien and a stranger to share the powers of Government with them.

The Government of the United States was not formed for the purpose of distributing its principles and advantages to foreign nations. It was formed with the sole view of securing those blessings to ourselves and our posterity. It follows from these principles that no power can reside in any public functionary to contract any engagement, or to pursue any measure which shall change the Union of the States. Nor was it necessary that any restrictive clause should have been inserted in the Constitution to restrain the public agents from exercising these extraordinary powers, because the restriction grows out of the nature of the Government. The President, with the advice of the Senate, has undoubtedly the right to form treaties, but in exercising these powers, he cannot barter away the Constitution, or the rights of particular States. It is easy to conceive that it must have been considered very important, by the original parties to the Constitution, that the limits of the United States should not be extended. The Government having been formed by a union of States, it is supposable that the fear of an undue or preponderating influence, in certain parts of this Union, must have great weight in the minds of those who might apprehend that such an influence might ultimately injure the interests of the States to which they belonged; and although they might consent to become parties to the Union, as it was then formed, it is highly probable they would never have consented to such a connexion, if a new world was to be thrown into the scale, to weigh down the influence which they might otherwise possess in the national councils.

From this view of the subject, I have been persuaded that the framers of the Constitution never intended that a power should reside in the President and Senate to form a treaty by which a foreign nation and people shall be incorporated into the Union, and that this treaty, so far as it stipulates for such an incorporation, is void.

But, it has been said that the treaty does not in fact incorporate the people of the ceded country into the Union, but stipulates that they shall be incorporated and admitted according to the principles of the Federal Constitution. Or, in other words, the treaty only pledges the faith of the nation that such an incorporation shall take place. On this point, I will observe, that there is no difference in principle between a direct incorporation by the words of a treaty, and a stipulation that an incorporation shall take place; because, if the faith of the nation is pledged in the latter case, the incorporation must take place, and it is of no consequence whether the treaty gives the incorporation, or produces the law which gives it; in both cases, the treaty produces the effect. And the question still returns, does there exist, under the Constitution, a power to incorporate into the Union by a treaty or by a law, a foreign nation or people? If it shall be admitted that no such power exists without an amendment to the Constitution, and it shall be said that the treaty-making power may stipulate for such an amendment, it will be a sufficient answer to say, that no power can reside in any of the national authorities to stipulate with a foreign nation for an amendment to the Constitution. The constituted authorities of our Union have been created to execute the Constitution, not to change, or stipulate for changing it, and they can in no case lay the States under the smallest obligation to make the smallest change. Stipulations, therefore, of this nature, which create no obligation, are void.

Again: It cannot be said that the stipulations for this incorporation are Constitutional and valid, because it is declared that the inhabitants of the ceded territory are to be admitted to the right of citizens, according to the principles of the Constitution; because if, as has been contended, there is no principle, in the existing Constitution, by which they can be incorporated, the stipulation and treaty is not only void, but absurd.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, (Mr. SMILIE,) has said, that it is competent for this Government to obtain a new territory by conquest, and if a new territory can be obtained by conquest, he infers that it can be procured in the manner provided for by the treaty. While I admit the premises of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I deny his conclusion. A new territory and new subjects may undoubtedly be obtained by conquest and by purchase; but neither the conquest nor the purchase can incorporate them into the Union. They must remain in the condition of colonies, and be governed accordingly. The objection to the third article is not that the province of Louisiana could not have been purchased, but that neither this nor any other foreign nation, can be incorporated into the Union by treaty or by a law; and as this country has been ceded to the United States only under the condition of an incorporation, it results that, if the condition is unconstitutional or impossible, the cession itself falls to the ground.

Although I am unwilling to detain the Committee at this late hour, and wish not to delay the wishes of the majority, yet I must be permitted again to refer the Committee to the seventh article of the treaty. This article declares, that the ships of France and Spain, together with their cargoes, being the produce or manufacture of those countries, shall be admitted into the ports of the ceded territory on the same terms, in regard to duties, with American ships. It is certainly worth the consideration of the Committee, whether this article is consistent with the provisions of the Constitution. As our laws now stand, the ships of France and Spain are liable to an extra tonnage duty, and their cargoes to a duty of ten per cent. advance, when arriving in the Atlantic ports. The treaty declares that, in the ports of the ceded territory, this extra duty of impost and tonnage shall cease. The treaty does not, and probably cannot, repeal the law, which lays this extra duty in the Atlantic States, but those duties must still be collected. The Constitution, however, declares, in the eighth section of the first article, that "all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States," and in the ninth section of the same article, it is said, that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce, or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." By the treaty, however, the uniformity of duties is destroyed, and by this regulation of commerce, contained in the treaty, a preference is certainly given to the ports of the ceded territory over those of the other States. Gentlemen who advocate the constitutionality of the treaty will scarcely say that the ceded territory is no part of the United States, and not embraced by the provisions of the Constitution, because such an assertion, while it avoided one difficulty would plunge them into another equally fatal, and prove that the third article is void, and, of course, that the cession itself is a nullity.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has said that the discriminating duties of impost and tonnage are not a Constitutional but a statute regulation. This is undoubtedly true, but it must be recollected that the statutes are in force, and, so long as they remain unrepealed, the preference is given to the ports on the Mississippi, and the uniformity of duties is violated; and it cannot, most assuredly, be correct, to violate a principle of the Constitution for a day, under the expectation of curing the violation by a Legislative interference. If, however, it is really intended in this side manner to bring about a repeal of the discriminating duties, I hope it may at this time be so understood. The commerce of this country, and particularly that of the Northern States, has long flourished under these protecting duties; and it would be extraordinary, indeed, if a treaty should be formed, laying the Government under an obligation to repeal laws so essential to our commercial prosperity.

Before I dismiss this part of the subject, it may not be improper to consider some points which have been started by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CROWNSHIELD,) in regard to the effect which the seventh article of the treaty must produce upon the commerce of the Eastern States. The remarks, which I shall submit upon these points, will apply only to the policy of the stipulation; but they may have some effect on those gentlemen who feel themselves at liberty to decide at large on the merits of the treaty; and they appear to me to be necessary, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, to whose opinions I cannot subscribe. It has appeared to me, that the stipulation in the seventh article must be highly injurious to the trade of the Eastern States. The ships of France and Spain are to be admitted into New Orleans, on the same terms with our own ships. The discriminating duty, therefore, in respect to them, in that port, is virtually repealed. But we obtain no repeal of the countervailing duties in French and Spanish ports. The consequence must be that, while we are laboring under all the embarrassments of extra duties in their ports, they are liberated from every embarrassment in ours. The effect is easy to be seen; the whole trade from the mouth of the Mississippi to the French and Spanish colonies, and probably to their European possessions, must ultimately be carried on in French and Spanish bottoms, to the entire exclusion of American ships. Nor will the injury stop here; both France and Spain will doubtless prefer procuring their supplies from the United States in their own ships, and, while they hold the monopoly of the trade to the mouth of the Mississippi, they will be able to draw from that point an abundant supply of flour and other articles of produce, to the great prejudice if not to the ruin of the trade from the Atlantic ports to the French and Spanish colonies. How gentlemen, under such circumstances, can consider the interests of the Eastern States uninjured, is to me inexplicable.

Without detaining the Committee longer upon this subject, I will only observe that it is my wish that every doubt touching the constitutionality of the treaty may be removed. I do not personally feel any peculiar hostility to it. The importance of the navigation of the Mississippi, and a place of deposit at the mouth of it, has long convinced me of the necessity of adopting measures to place those objects beyond all future hazard. At the same time, I must be permitted to say, that I have not viewed the advantages from possessing the country on the west, as some gentlemen appear to have considered them. This subject was much considered during the last session of Congress, but it will not be found either in the report of the secret committee, which has recently been published, or in any document or debate, that any individual entertained the least wish to obtain the province of Louisiana; our views were then confined to New Orleans and the Floridas, and, in my judgment, it would have been happy for this country, if they were still confined within those limits. The vast and unmanageable extent which the accession of Louisiana will give to the United States; the consequent dispersion of our population, and the destruction of that balance which it is so important to maintain between the Eastern and the Western States, threatens, at no very distant day, the subversion of our Union. For these reasons, and many others which I will not detain the Committee to detail, I have doubted the policy of the treaty itself, when taken altogether; but the only points on which I feel myself at liberty to decide, are those which have been before explained, respecting the constitutionality of the treaty, and, until the doubts on these points are cleared up, I shall be compelled to vote against the resolution for carrying the treaty into execution.

Mr. NICHOLSON apologized for rising at so late an hour, and begged the indulgence of the Committee for a short time. He said he would endeavor to pursue the laudable example held out by the gentleman from Connecticut, who had just sat down, (Mr. R. GRISWOLD,) by compressing his observations into as small a compass as possible. He should, therefore, necessarily be compelled to pass over the immense advantages which would be derived to the United States from the acquisition of territory made by the treaty with France; nor, indeed, did he consider it a subject that required to be dwelt on in this House, as the attention of the public had been drawn to it for some months past, and he believed that nothing could now be added to the volumes which had been already written and circulated in the daily prints.

Gentlemen had noticed the report of a committee during the last session, of which he had the honor to be the chairman, and had endeavored to question the value of the acquired territory, because that report had only contemplated the acquisition of New Orleans and the Floridas. It was certainly true that the committee, in viewing this subject, had confined themselves to the immediate cause of complaint, and as the right of deposit had been suspended at New Orleans, their great object was to have this restored as speedily as possible, and to recommend such measures as would prevent a similar suspension at a future day. An inquiry of this kind naturally led to a view of the situation of the Western country generally, and it was readily perceived that the same inconveniences which had occurred in relation to the mouth of the Mississippi, might at some future period, perhaps not very distant, embarrass the commerce of the whole Mississippi Territory, the western part of Georgia, and the eastern parts of Tennessee. It was seen that the produce of this valuable country must be carried to sea by means of the great rivers which rise in the Mississippi Territory, but pass through East and West Florida before they reach the Gulf of Mexico; and the committee were of opinion that these ought, if possible, to be secured by treaty. As one of the committee, he was free to declare that he did not at that time entertain the most distant idea that the almost boundless tract of country lying west of the Mississippi, could be obtained by our Government on any terms, much less for the comparatively inconsiderable sum which we had agreed to pay for it. Had he then offered an opinion on the subject, he should have no hesitation to say that the west bank of the Mississippi was almost incalculable in its value to the United States, if it was only for the purpose of preventing any foreign nation from colonizing it. If that country were thickly settled by a foreign nation, the whole river Mississippi, from its source to the sea, must have been guarded by a strong chain of military posts; whereas the wilderness itself will now present an almost insurmountable barrier to any nation that may be inclined to disturb us in that quarter. The opportunity of acquiring this country, together with the island of New Orleans had presented itself to our Executive, and they had most wisely resolved to embrace it. The error, which had been spoken of in the report, was in fact no error. The committee intended to offer a geographical and not a historical view of the subject. Their object was to describe the country lying between the southern boundary and the Gulf of Mexico, and they adopted such names as were used by modern geographers, without intending to settle the dispute as to the ancient boundaries of Louisiana.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had very accurately detailed the various changes that territory had undergone, and had correctly stated, that it was divided into East and West Florida after the peace of 1763, while in possession of Great Britain. If we should be able to fix the eastern boundary of Louisiana at the river Perdido, there was no doubt that the value of our purchase would be considerably enhanced, as by that means we should certainly secure the whole of the Mobile bay, and the mouths of some other large rivers. Mr. N. said, however, he did not mean to go into a consideration of the numberless advantages derived to us by the acquisition of Louisiana, nor would he at that very late hour have trespassed upon the time of the Committee, but for the Constitutional doubts which had been expressed by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

These Constitutional difficulties, he said, appeared to him to be entirely separate and distinct, though gentlemen had very ingeniously blended them, and had considered them as one. Whether the United States, as a sovereign and independent empire, had a right to acquire territory, was one question, but whether they could admit that territory into the Union, upon an equal footing with the other States, was a question of a very different nature. Upon this latter point, he meant to offer no opinion, because he did not consider it before the House; when the subject should come properly into discussion, he should have no objection, not only to enter at large into the Constitutional authority to admit the newly acquired territory into the Union as a State, but likewise to inquire whether this was really the spirit and intention of the third article of the treaty? The question now before the Committee was, is it expedient to carry this treaty into effect? And to be sure, if gentlemen were of opinion that the Government had no authority to acquire territory, the treaty ought to be rejected, because we should gain nothing by it.

But, sir, said Mr. N., had I been asked anywhere but in this House, whether a sovereign nation had a right to acquire new territory, I should have thought the question an absurd one. It appears to me too plain and undeniable to admit of demonstration? Is it necessary to resort to ancient authorities to establish a position which is proved by the conduct pursued by all nations, from the earliest periods of the world, and which arises from the very nature of society? Can it be doubted that, when a State is attacked, it has the right to assail its enemy in turn, and weaken the aggressor by dispossessing him of a part of his territory? Surely, the opinions of all writers, both ancient and modern, and the examples of all nations, in all ages, can leave no reason to doubt on this subject. But, sir, on this, as on most other occasions, we are told that the Constitution stares us in the face, and that this treaty cannot be carried into effect without violating the Constitution. If, indeed, this sacred instrument forbids the acquisition of territory by the United States, I will most readily admit that we ought to stop here.

Let the Constitution, however, be examined, let the principles on which it was formed be taken into view, and it will be found that, instead of forbidding, the Constitution recognises the authority to acquire territory. In the year 1776, when the United States absolved their allegiance to Great Britain, each State became a separate and independent sovereignty. As independent sovereignties, they had full power, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, "to levy war, 'conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things which 'independent States might of right do.'" Each State, separately and for itself, had all the attributes of sovereignty, and no man can be hardy enough to deny that, at that time, any of the respective States had the capacity to extend its limits, either by conquest or by purchase. These are the only two methods, indeed, by which territory may be acquired; and there have been very few wars in which the subjects of one nation or another have not been compelled to change masters. In the year 1781, the articles of Confederation were finally agreed to, and each State surrendered a portion of its sovereignty for the common benefit of the whole. Much was reserved, but much was given up. The management of external concerns was given to Congress, and Congress alone had the power to levy war, conclude peace, and contract alliances. The capacity of the individual States to acquire new territory no longer remained to them. It was surrendered to the General Government, with the powers of peace and war. In the year 1788, the States again returned, as it were, to their original independence. Their sovereignty was once more assumed. They deliberated about the means of a more permanent Union, to secure to themselves and their posterity all the blessings of liberty. The present Constitution was adopted, and even a larger portion of individual sovereignty was surrendered. The right to declare war was given to Congress, the right to make treaties to the President and Senate. Conquest and purchase alone are the means by which nations acquire territory. The one can only be effected by war, the other by treaty, and when the States divested themselves of these powers, and gave them to the General Government, they gave, at the same time, that right to acquire territory, which they themselves originally had. The right must exist somewhere. It is essential to independent sovereignty. The tenth section of the first article of the Constitution expressly prohibits the States from entering into treaties, or levying war, and even from forming any compact or agreement with another State, or a foreign Power, without the consent of Congress. All the rights which the States originally enjoyed, are either reserved to the States, or are vested in the General Government. If they once had the power individually to acquire territory, and this is now prohibited to them by the Constitution, it follows, of course, that the power is vested in the United States.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) admits that, during the last session, he was an advocate for very vigorous measures. By vigorous measures, he means war. Will he deny, that it was his wish to seize upon New Orleans by force? Will he deny, that this, and this alone, was the reason why his friends and himself did not unite with us in the measures then adopted for the purpose of acquiring this country? If the gentleman's object was war, if his object was conquest, did he mean that we should drive all the inhabitants of the island into the Gulf of Mexico, and afterward retire into our own limits? Did he wish that we should fight for the sake of conquest only, and not with a view to enjoyment? If he then thought that, after conquering New Orleans, we should have a right to hold it, surely, it will not now be denied that we can hold it, after having obtained it by peaceable measures.

The gentleman seems, however, partly to have abandoned this ground, but, in his opinion, the treaty itself violated the Constitution. With that gentleman, I am unwilling to set the Constitution at defiance. I trust we shall maintain it in all its vigor. The third article of the treaty, he says, either admits the ceded territory into the Union immediately, or pledges us to do it hereafter. It cannot be contended that the territory is ipso facto admitted, but the objection is, that the President and Senate have no right to pledge the Government for anything not immediately within their own powers. This objection is not solid. Every day's practice proves that it is without any force whatever. The President and the Senate have the treaty-making power vested in them, but almost all their treaties contain stipulations which must be performed by this House, if they are ever performed at all. In our last convention with Great Britain, the President and Senate pledged the United States to the payment of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, yet the payment of this money was not within the powers granted to them by the Constitution, nor could it ever have been paid without the concurrence of this House. It was never doubted, however, that this stipulation was Constitutional. The present treaty with France pledges the United States to the payment of fifteen millions of dollars, yet gentlemen do not question the constitutionality of this measure, although it never can be carried into effect without the co-operation of this House. In fact, there is no treaty made with a foreign Power in which some of the regulations must not lie entirely inactive, unless this House shall give its assent to them. So, in the present instance, the fifteen millions of dollars can never be paid, nor the ceded territory admitted into the Union, unless this House shall give its assent.

It is said, however, that Congress cannot, under the Constitution, admit foreign territory into the Union upon an equal footing with the States, even under that article of the Constitution which provides that new States may be admitted. I have before said that, upon this point, I mean to offer no opinion, because, at this time, I think it unnecessary; nor need we now inquire, whether this is, in reality, the meaning of the treaty. The gentleman from Connecticut, however, assuming this ground, contends that as the treaty embraces objects not in the power of the General Government the whole is, of course, invalid. There may be some plausibility in this argument, but it is plausibility only. It has been already proved that the treaty-making power frequently and of necessity embraces objects not in the power of the President and Senate, but of the whole Legislature, yet that this does not of course invalidate the treaty. It may be shown that, where a treaty contains stipulations which are not in the power of the General Government, and, of course, cannot be carried into effect, yet that this does not invalidate the whole, although these particular stipulations may of themselves be void. An instrument might sometimes contain covenants which were impossible, or that were mala in se; these, of course, would be void, but others might, nevertheless, stand good. I take a distinction, which I am warranted in by the best writers, between articles of a treaty, which are violated by one party, and articles which, from the nature of things, or from previous engagements, are void. Where one party violates an article in a treaty, the other has the right to declare the whole void, because the violation is a breach of faith, and is a voluntary act. But where some of the stipulations of a treaty are impossible to be performed, or cannot be fulfilled consistently with the engagements of an antecedent treaty with a third Power, these are, of course, void, but other parts will stand good. A variety of cases might be cited to prove this, but a very strong one will be found in our Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, concluded in 1783. The fourth article of that treaty provided that creditors on either side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of debts bona fide contracted previous to the war. This was a stipulation which Congress could not perform. In all matters relating to the recovery of debts, the individual States retained entire and uncontrolled authority. The objects embraced by this article were completely out of the power of Congress. The right to make treaties had been committed by the articles of Confederacy to the General Government, but, in this particular, the assent of the States was absolutely necessary before that part of the treaty could be carried into effect. Great Britain remonstrated repeatedly, but some of the States, particularly Virginia, refused to concur. Congress recommended it to the States, to declare the treaty the supreme law, but the recommendation was not attended to. That article of the treaty was, of course, invalid, and never was fulfilled on the part of the United States. Yet it is certain that the whole treaty was not thereby rendered a nullity. Our independence was acknowledged. Hostilities ceased, and the British armies were withdrawn. The cases are extremely analogous, and if it should finally be determined that Congress cannot admit the ceded territory into the Union as a State, yet the other parts of the treaty with France will stand good. If this was the intention of our Ministers, (which, perhaps, may be doubted,) they seem to have guarded against the event of a refusal either by Congress or by the people. For it is declared expressly that, until the inhabitants can be incorporated into the Union, and can be admitted to all the privileges of citizenship, they shall be protected in the enjoyment of their civil and religious rights.

The other Constitutional objection is raised upon the seventh article of the treaty, which provides that the ships of France and Spain shall be admitted for twelve years into the ports of the ceded territory, without paying higher duties than the ships of the United States. To this gentlemen have opposed that part of the Constitution which declares that no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another, and that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform through the United States. There appears to be a strange inconsistency in the arguments of the gentleman from Connecticut. He tells you that this territory is not a State, and that it never can become a State; yet he afterwards declares that the treaty violates the Constitution by giving the port of New Orleans a preference over the ports of the Atlantic States. There is surely a contradiction here. Whatever may be the future destiny of Louisiana, it is certain that it is not now a State. It is a territory purchased by the United States, in their confederate capacity, and may be disposed of by them at pleasure. It is in the nature of a colony whose commerce may be regulated without any reference to the Constitution. Had it been the Island of Cuba which was ceded to us, under a similar condition of admitting French and Spanish vessels for a limited time into the Havannah, could it possibly have been contended that this would be giving a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, or that the uniformity of duties, imposts, and excises throughout the United States would have been destroyed? And because Louisiana lies adjacent to our own territory, is it to be viewed in a different light? Or can the circumstance of its being separated by a river only, instead of the sea, constitute any real difference in regard to the commercial regulations which we may think proper to establish? The restrictions in the Constitution are to be strictly construed, and I doubt whether under a strict construction the very same indulgence might not be granted to the port of Natchez, which does not lie within any State, but in the territory of the United States. It has never been deemed expedient to do so, and in all probability never will. Nor is it presumable that this regulation in relation to New Orleans would have been made, but for the importance of the great objects with which it was connected.

Mr. N. believed that the gentleman from Connecticut need not entertain any apprehensions that the provisions contained in the seventh article of the treaty were intended to commence the repeal of the countervailing duties. It was true that some gentlemen had thought very favorably of the repeal at a former session, and he acknowledged himself to be of that number. But as it was a regulation more materially affecting the commercial part of the community, and as they had been opposed to it, the subject was dropped. He did not know that there was any intention to revive it, although possibly a majority of that House might be inclined to assent to it. Yet this could have no connexion with the treaty, much less could it have any connexion with the question immediately under consideration. We only have to determine whether we will carry this treaty into effect. Whether we will agree to appropriate the fifteen millions of dollars, and authorize the President to take possession. The latter has been agreed to, and surely we cannot consent to receive possession without paying the equivalent promised on our part.

Mr. N. closed his remarks by again begging pardon of the Committee for the time he had occupied, and offered his acknowledgments for the indulgent attention he had received.

Mr. RONNEY said, that in the observations he rose to make at that late hour, he should be brief, and apply them entirely to the Constitutional question, as it was scarcely contended the bargain was not a good one. In making them he cordially joined with the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) when he expressed his wish that the discussion should be conducted with coolness and temper. It was not only the duty, but the interest, of every gentleman on the floor that this important subject should be decided on argument and argument alone. He felt the force of the objection urged by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) that the discussion of some of the points was premature. He should, however, enter into a brief exposition of them.

It is contended that the United States have no right to purchase territory; that they have no right to admit the people of Louisiana to a participation of the rights derived from an admission into the Union, and that a peculiar favor is about being granted to the ports of New Orleans, in violation of the Constitution.

In the view of the Constitution the Union was composed of two corporate bodies, of States and Territories. A recurrence to the Constitution will show that it is predicated on the principle of the United States acquiring territory, either by war, treaty, or purchase. There was one part of that instrument within whose capacious grasp all these modes of acquisition were embraced. By the Constitution Congress have power to "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." To provide for the general welfare! The import of these terms is very comprehensive indeed. If this general delegation of authority be not at variance with other particular powers specially granted, nor restricted by them; if it be not in any degree comprehended in those subsequently delegated, I cannot perceive why, within the fair meaning of this general provision is not included the power of increasing our territory, if necessary for the general welfare or common defence. Suppose, for instance, that Great Britain should propose to cede to us the island of New Providence, so long the seat of pirates preying upon our commerce, and the hive from which they have swarmed; will any gentleman say that we ought not to embrace the opportunity presented as a defence against further depredations? Suppose the Cape of Good Hope, where our East-Indiamen so generally stop, were offered to be ceded to us by the nation to which it belongs, and that nation should say on our possessing it, you shall declare it a free port. Is there any member who hears me that could contend that we were not authorized to receive it, notwithstanding the great advantages it would insure to us?

But it appears to me, independently of this provision of the Constitution, and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) admits it, that according to the rights of war we may extend our territory. An enemy might come within our lines, and we expel him: our lines not being the limits to which our arms would be confined, we could pass them, and take possession of the enemy's country, and thereby undoubtedly acquire a right to the territory occupied. For, in the Constitution, it is expressly said that Congress shall have power "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;" and among the jura bella was clearly recognised the right of annexing territory. But there is one article of the Constitution which is predicated on the right to purchase territory. We have a right to obtain territory by purchase from a State. In the provision made in the Constitution respecting the territory of the United States, we find that Congress are invested with power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings." Here, then, is given to Congress exclusive legislation over particular places, over the ten miles square, and over such places as they may purchase. This provision is expressly predicated on the right to purchase, and only limits that purchase by the consent of the States. If Congress have the right of purchasing territory from a State, how can gentlemen contend that they have not the right of purchasing territory elsewhere, if in their judgment they shall consider it well calculated to subserve the great interests of the Union?

It does appear to me that the right of acquiring territory must be included in the treaty-making power. As there are very few treaties which are not merely commercial that do not change the property belonging to nations; and if this principal power be contained in the treaty making provision, every incidental power is of consequence to be considered as fairly embraced within it, and I should deem this important authority as nugatory, if it did not give the President and Senate the right to accept a cession of territory. It is certainly not the right of the President and Senate to make such a cession conclusively binding; when it shall embrace powers within the pale of those delegated to this House, it will require our sanction. Have we not also vested in us every power necessary for carrying such a treaty into effect, in the words of the Constitution, which gives Congress the authority to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof?" It, therefore, appears very clearly to my mind that, according to the Constitution, the United States have a right to acquire territory. If they possess this right according to the Constitution, this measure cannot be said to be unconstitutional, and if not unconstitutional, as the gentlemen who have spoken against it, did not insist upon the point of inexpediency, some of them because they believed that ground was not open, and others because it was not tenable, will ultimately give it their support.

But another Constitutional objection is stated. Though the United States may acquire a valid title to the territory, the hills and the groves, the rivers and the lakes, it is alleged that they have no right to bring the persons inhabiting it into a state in which they shall enjoy the blessings of free government. My friend from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) has observed that the article of the treaty relating to this object is most cautiously worded. If ever there was a precision of language calculated to avoid the imputation of an invasion of the Constitution, it is the language of this article. Its words are:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

How are these people to be admitted? According to the principles of the Federal Constitution. Is it an open violation of any part of the Constitution? No; an express reservation is made by those who formed the treaty, that they must be admitted under the Constitution. Now, if admitted agreeably to the Constitution, it cannot be said to be in violation of it; and if not in violation of it, the fears of gentlemen are groundless. But, as I observed before, does not the Constitution refer to territory? Do not the United States possess territories now? Is the possession of territory confined by the Constitution to those they now hold? I believe not; for, in the Constitution, it is stated that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Here is a clear recognition of territory belonging to the United States, and not merely of territory then held, but of territory which might in future be acquired by treaty or purchase. And if this territory be ceded to the United States, Congress have power, as soon as it is ceded, to make rules and regulations respecting it.

H. OF R.

The Louisiana Treaty.

OCTOBER, 1803.

There is another sound answer to the objections of gentlemen. This is property ceded to us, by the Power ceding it, with a particular reservation. I am not for quibbling about words or distorting terms. Taking the seventh article, and fairly considering it, it amounts to nothing more than a particular reservation—upon delivering possession of the territory, which I take to be the true meaning of the language which is used; and will any gentleman say that accepting the treaty, under this stipulation, will not be most advantageous to us? What individual State will be affected by it more than any other? Does it give the State of Massachusetts an advantage over New York? I would be glad to know what State it particularly affects, and in what way. "No preference," says the Constitution, "shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." In what way, under this treaty, is there any preference of one port over another? I would be glad to see it pointed out, and to be shown whether there is any preference of Delaware over Massachusetts, or of Virginia over Georgia. No. The Constitution adverts to States themselves; and that the distinction between States and Territories is bottomed upon reason. Whence the necessity of the distinction? When Territories grow into States, and become represented in the public councils, a majority of them may league together, and carry into effect regulations prejudicial to other States. Hence the Constitution provides that in all commercial regulations all the States shall be equally affected. But such a league cannot be affected by Territories, which have no Senators in the other branch, and in this only the voice, without the vote, of a single delegate. Independent of this consideration is this: if by any particular territorial regulation the territory of the United States is benefited, that territory being the common property of the United States, a public stock in which they all share, every State in the Union reaps alike the benefit.

These are my reasons for considering this measure perfectly Constitutional. I might dwell upon these reasons corroborative of this conviction; but these have been so ably enforced by my friends from Virginia and Maryland, and by other gentlemen, as to render more remarks superfluous. I cannot, however, avoid noticing the observation made yesterday and reiterated to-day, that we do not know whether we have a title to this territory, or whether it be not the purchase of so many acres of mere moonshine. I voted yesterday for some papers because I wished beyond all cavil or dispute to establish the Constitutional right of this House to call for papers, and from a respect to the opinions of some gentlemen who considered them important, not from any doubts of my own as to the validity of the title. The publicity of the cession of Louisiana by Spain, its former owner, to France, is too notorious; it has been noticed, dilated on, and recognised in the British Parliament, and in the Senate of the United States. We have not in our possession, it is true, the original Treaty of St. Ildefonso, nor the subsequent one, concluded between France and Spain at Madrid, which referred to the former, for we were not furnished with duplicates of either, nor have we the testimony of the King of Etruria to prove that every stipulation contained in them was strictly complied with—poor man! he is no more. We have not sent a Commissioner to Madrid or St. Cloud to take the examination of the Ministers of Spain and France, to obtain their evidence, in order to verify the fact of all conditions having been performed by France on her part; but we have seen in the papers which record the transactions of the times, the arrival of the French Prefect of Louisiana at New Orleans announced. We have read his proclamation to the inhabitants of that country informing them of the cession, and, if I mistake not, our own Government has received through the proper channel intelligence of the same event, which has been duly published. All these circumstances combined are satisfactory to my mind on this subject. No fact in the history of nations can be more rationally proved, and gentlemen should recollect that they rely on the same kind of testimony (the letter of Mr. King to the answer of Lord Hawkesbury) when they confess themselves satisfied that England is agreed to this measure.

I would further observe, from the course which the debate has taken, that if we had taken all the papers and documents which the gentlemen desire, agreeably to the mode of argument which they have adopted, they might object to passing the necessary laws until we had got possession of the country, and at the same time object to our taking possession, without laws to authorize it. By thus arguing in a circle, as the logicians term it, they would most effectually defeat an object of the first importance to the community, and render the acquisition of an inestimable territory of as little value as the same extent of moonshine or starlight. With these impressions, believing the measure a good one, and consistent with the Constitution, I shall most cheerfully give my vote for carrying it into effect.

Mr. MITCHILL rose, and said, he entreated the indulgence of the Committee for rising at so late a stage of the debate, when seven hours have already been employed in the sitting of the day. And the reason of his request was, that such extraordinary doctrines have been advanced against carrying into effect the treaty with France which cedes Louisiana to our nation, and such repeated allusions have been made to the sentiments which he submitted to the House during the debate of yesterday, that he felt himself called upon to attempt a reply, and therein to show that the grounds taken by the gentlemen of the opposition are neither strong nor tenable. Although the subject is ample and copious, he should endeavor to condense his remarks, to so moderate a compass, as not to trespass long upon the patience of the Committee.

My colleague, said Mr. M., who opened the debate this morning, (Mr. G. GRISWOLD,) displayed in his speech the objections raised against the resolution on the table, so fully, that he almost exhausted the subject. For, in listening attentively to the reasoning of the gentleman from

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

Virginia, who followed him, (Mr. J. LEWIS,) and of the other gentleman from Virginia, who spoke next, (Mr. GRIFFIN,) he could not discern that any new or additional matter of much consequence had been urged. Nor did he discover much more than a repetition in substance of his colleague's reasoning, in what had been urged by the gentleman from Mass., (Mr. THATCHER,) and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD;) though the statement of their objections had received a form and coloring diversified according to the skill and ingenuity of each.

In the reply which he should make to the gentlemen in opposition to the appropriations for carrying the treaty into operation, he should not examine their arguments, severally, as they had been brought forward in the course of the debate. That mode would necessarily lead him into tedious and needless repetition. He should, therefore, endeavor to reduce all the arguments he had heard from the other side of the House into their elementary propositions, and having done so, to show that they were weak in their nature, and wrong in their direction. And even this view of the question would be much circumscribed, on account of the strong and masterly manner in which a part of the objections had been already repelled by his eloquent friend from Virginia, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH,) and by the impressive remarks of his other friend from Delaware (Mr. RODNEY.)

The gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, who resist the provisions necessary to the completion of this treaty, do so because they say it has been ratified by the President and Senate in open violation of the Constitution of the United States, and is, therefore, no treaty, but a nullity, an instrument void ab initio, not a part of the supreme law of the land, and consequently not binding upon Congress or the nation. They draw this bold and extraordinary conclusion from the style and meaning of the 3d and 7th articles of the treaty. The former of these, they say, is unconstitutional, because it proposes to annex a new territory, with its inhabitants, to our present dominion; the latter, because it abolishes for a term of years the discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the ceded territory, giving a preference there to France and Spain, and leaving those duties unaltered in all the ports of the Union.

By the third article, it is agreed that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the union of the United States as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, and be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

On expounding this article, my colleague has declared that the President and Senate have no power to acquire new territory by treaty, and he argues that our people are to be forever confined to their present limits. This is an assertion directly contrary to the powers inherent in independent nations, and contradictory to the frequent and allowed exercise of that power in our own nation. We are constantly in the practice of receiving territory by cession from the red men of the West, the aborigines of our country. The very treaty mentioned in the President's Message, with the Kaskaskias Indians, whereby we have acquired a large extent of land, would, according to this doctrine, be unconstitutional; and so would all the treaties which add to the size of our statute book, with the numerous tribes of the natives on our frontiers. According to this construction, all our negotiations so happily concluded with those people, whom we ever have uniformly acknowledged as the sovereigns of the soil, are nugatory, and to be holden for naught. He said, he was perfectly aware of the answer which would be made, that we held all our national domain, under Great Britain, by virtue of the treaty concluded at Paris in 1783. What, after all, was the amount of that cession by England? Certainly not a conveyance of a country which never was theirs, but rightfully belonged to the Indian natives; for it was, in its true construction, merely a quit claim of the pretensions or title to the land which the English had obtained by conquest and treaty from the French. By that negotiation, the United States obtained a bare relinquishment of the claims and possessions of those two powerful nations. But the paramount title of the original inhabitants was not affected by this. However contemptuously the rights of these rude and feeble tribes had been regarded by the Europeans, their descendants in these States had considered them with recognition and respect. Until the Indians sold their lands for an equivalent, the humane and just principles of the American Government acknowledged them to be the only legitimate owners. And the sovereignty acquired by treaty or purchase to our Government was derived from the title which the natives transferred to them as grantees in a fair bargain and sale. Such, Mr. M. argued, were the rules of true construction, and these rules admitted and acted upon by the Federal Government; and yet, according to the novel doctrine of this day, every treaty with the natives for parcels of their country, although hitherto deemed lawful, would be an unconstitutional act. According to this notion, every treaty for lands, held with the aborigines since the organization of the Government, was a violation of the Constitution. And thus this invaluable instrument, this bulwark of our liberties, had been violated perhaps twenty times or more, since we began to buy the surplusage of their hunting grounds. The Indian tribes are as much aliens as any other foreign nations. Their lands are as much foreign dominion as the soil of France or Spain. Yet we have gone on to annex the territories which they sold us, to our present territory, from the time we acquired independence, and no mortal, until this debate arose, Mr. Chairman, has so much as thought that thereby a breach of the Constitution was made. My colleague is surely entitled to great credit for his perspicuity in finding out that all our great and wise predecessors in administering this Government have been blunderers and constitution-breakers. But, Sir, the just judgment on this subject is, that the Presidents and Senate of the United States have heretofore acted constitutionally in acquiring by purchase foreign dominions from the alien Indians. And by a parity of reasoning, they have acted not only constitutionally, but eminently for the interest of the country, in buying Louisiana from the white men, its present sovereigns.

But, independent of correct principles and steady precedent in favor of the acquirement of new territory, it may be worth the while to mention a few of the strange consequences which flow from the doctrine which the gentlemen of the other side of the House contend for. According to their reasoning, if by any force of the currents of the ocean, or any conflicts of the winds and the waves, a new surface of earth should emerge from the neighborhood of Cape Hatteras, it would be unconstitutional to take possession of it. Yet it appears to me, sir, very like an absurdity to say the United States would break their bond of union by erecting a light-house on it. Suppose that, by volcanic action, islands should be suddenly elevated from the bottom of the neighboring Atlantic, as they have repeatedly risen from the depths of the Mediterranean, would it be unconstitutional to take possession of them? So far from it, there would on the other hand be a duty in the Government to assume the dominion of all adjacent islands. Again; suppose for a moment that our present limits were full of people, would it be unconstitutional to purchase additional territory for them to settle upon? Must the hive always contain its present numbers, and no swarm ever go forth? At this rate we should, before a great lapse of time, arrive at a plenum of inhabitants, and if no new settlement could be obtained for them, the Chinese custom of infanticide must be tolerated to get rid of those tender little beings for whom food enough could not be procured, to rear them to manhood. And thus, when this maximum of population shall have arrived, there would be no Constitutional power to purchase and possess any of the waste lands on this or the other side of the Mississippi, for them to spread and thrive upon. A doctrine against which, he confessed, his understanding revolted.

Our Government having in this manner the right of acquiring additional territory, had very often exercised that right by actual purchases and by possessions and settlements afterwards. The whole of the recent State of Ohio and of the Indiana Territory was obtained and peopled in this manner. And in the settlement of limits both on the side of Florida and Nova Scotia, the principle had again and again been acted upon; and strange to tell, nobody, until this eventful time, had possessed acuteness enough to find out the error.

But the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. GRISWOLD) contends that even if we had a right to purchase soil, we have no business with the inhabitants. His words, however, are very select; for he said and often repeated it that the treaty-making power did not extend to the admission of foreign nations into this confederacy. To this it may be replied that the President and Senate have not attempted to admit foreign nations into our confederacy. They have bought a tract of land, out of their regard to the good of our people and their welfare. And this land, Congress are called upon to pay for. Unfortunately for the bargain, this region contains civilized and Christian inhabitants; and their existence there, it is alleged, nullifies the treaty. The gentleman construed the Constitution of the United States very differently from the manner in which Mr. M. himself did. By the third section of the third article of that instrument, it is declared, that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States, and nothing therein contained shall be construed so as to prejudice any claim of the United States or of any particular State.

In the case of Louisiana no injury is done either to the nation or to any State belonging to that great body politic. There was nothing compulsory upon the inhabitants of Louisiana to make them stay and submit to our Government. But if they chose to remain, it had been most kindly and wisely provided, that until they should be admitted to the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, they shall be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. What would the gentleman propose that we shall do with them? Send them away to the Spanish provinces, or turn them loose in the wilderness? No, sir, it is our purpose to pursue a much more dignified system of measures. It is intended, first, to extend to this newly acquired people the blessings of law and social order. To protect them from rapacity, violence, and anarchy. To make them secure in their lives, limbs, and property, reputation, and civil privileges. To make them safe in the rights of conscience. In this way they are to be trained up in a knowledge of our own laws and institutions. They are thus to serve an apprenticeship to liberty; they are to be taught the lessons of freedom; and by degrees they are to be raised to the enjoyment and practice of independence. All this is to be done as soon as possible; that is, as soon as the nature of the case will permit; and according to the principles of the Federal Constitution. Strange! that proceedings declared on the face of them to be Constitutional, should be inveighed against as violations of the Constitution! Secondly, after they shall have been a sufficient length of time in this probationary condition, they shall, as soon as the principles of the Constitution permit, and conformably thereto, be declared citizens of the United States. Congress will judge of the time, manner, and expediency of this. The act we are now about to perform will not confer on them this elevated character. They will thereby gain no admission into this House, nor into the other House of Congress. There will be no alien influence thereby introduced into our councils. By degrees, however, they will pass on from the childhood of republicanism, through the improving period of youth, and arrive at the mature experience of manhood. And then, they may be admitted to the full privileges which their merit and station will entitle them to. At that time a general law of naturalization may be passed. For I do not venture to affirm that, by the mere act of cession, the inhabitants of a ceded country become, of course, citizens of the country to which they are annexed. It seems not to be the case, unless specially provided for. By the third article it is stipulated, that the inhabitants of Louisiana shall hereafter be made citizens; ergo they are not made citizens of the United States by mere operation of treaty. In confirmation of this construction, I will mention the second article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, concluded in 1794. It is therein stipulated that all British subjects who shall continue within the evacuated posts and precincts, should be considered, if they remained there longer than one year, to have abandoned all allegiance to the Crown of Britain, and to have made their election to become citizens of the United States: after which, by taking the oath of allegiance, they became instantly, by act of treaty, and by force of statute, citizens of the United States. I, therefore, consider the point already adjudged, when the Treaty of 1794 was decided on, that without an act of Congress aliens can be converted into citizens by the provisions of a treaty duly ratified by the President and Senate. In the treaty respecting Louisiana, there is happily no cause for alarm. This power of making citizens has not been exercised by the President and Senate; but at a future day may be used by Congress.

But I proceed to the second objection to the treaty. This is derived from an alleged unconstitutionality in the 7th article. By this, it is agreed that French ships coming directly from France, or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of France or her said colonies, shall be admitted for twelve years into New Orleans and the other legal ports of entry in Louisiana, without being subject to any greater duty on merchandise or tonnage than is paid by our own citizens. The like covenant exists with regard to the ships, ports, and colonies, of Spain. This, they say, is a violation of a declaration contained in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

In my view of the subject, Mr. Chairman, this prohibitory clause of the Constitution is meant as a check to the legislative power of Congress only, and by no means as a restraint upon the treaty-making power of the President and Senate. The Constitution leaves this very broad, and with great wisdom; it being improper and impossible to limit the negotiations which it might be expedient for this Government to make with other Governments. From the silence of the Constitution on the matter and extent of the treaties, it has been argued, with great appearance of truth and fairness, that there is no Constitutional boundaries to the treaty-making authority. Hence, according to this mode of reasoning, the treaty-making privilege, being so vast and unlimited, is unfettered by Constitutional impediments, and like that great charter of freedom itself, originates from its own source, supreme laws of the land. A treaty, therefore, can scarcely be conceived to be unconstitutional; except in the case of outraging all common principles, rights, and feelings. On this ground, the commercial regulations of the 7th article are secured against all charges of unconstitutionality.

But, even if the treaty-making power was not so extensive and mighty, there would be no violation of any of its directions by granting the favors to Spain and France which the treaty stipulates. For the preference forbidden by the Constitution applies to States in the Union and equal members thereof. The domain we are about to acquire is not a State; for that is a sovereign and independent republic. Nor is it a province; this being an inhabited country, subdued by force of arms. Nor is it a colony; which is a sprout or scion, as it were, of the parent trunk. In its relation to us, it is a territory; a word signifying a peculiar and mingled idea of a country and inhabitants in the inchoate or initial condition of a republic. By the treaty, therefore, there is no preference given to one State over another, in any commercial regulations. The port of New Orleans is not a part of any State in the Union. The abolition of the discriminating duties in favor of the two European nations is confined absolutely to the ports of Louisiana. They have no preference in the ports of any of the States. Nor is there given to one an advantage over the other. In right construction, these indulgences are, in fact, a part of the purchase money; and, on account of this valuable consideration, Congress will have less money to appropriate and the nation thereby be saved from several millions additional debt. Our constituents have certainly great reason to rejoice at this. I, therefore, conclude that the apprehension and alarm expressed by the two gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. J. LEWIS and Mr. GRIFFIN) were wholly unfounded. There is no breach of the Constitution.

Notwithstanding all this, one gentleman says, the adoption of this seventh article will give "a death wound to the northern commerce of the United States;" and another declares, "that under it, France and Spain will gain a monopoly of the commerce and navigation of Louisiana, and the adjacent country." Mr. M. said he could not conceive how this should happen. Ever since the ratification of the Treaty of St. Lorenzo el Real, there had been a great resort of American vessels to the Mississippi. From New York, in particular, there had been large and frequent commercial intercourse, almost ever since that time. This had been rapidly increasing, and promised to be more and more important—and all this under a foreign jurisdiction, and while Louisiana belonged to Spain. Now that province was about to be changed into a Territory of the United States. What an augmentation of tonnage and navigation might we not expect, when our own Mississippi should be whitened with our canvass! How eagerly would the Eastern and Middle States engage in a carrying trade, now rendered easy and free from impediment! It appeared to him that the transportation of the vast and valuable productions of both banks of that river would increase the demand for vessels. Greater capital will be called for to carry on the Louisiana commerce, and greater profits would result. Ship building, and all the attendant arts, would be promoted. The number of seamen would be augmented; who, trained up to maritime discipline in merchant vessels, might on any appearance of danger be transferred to the Navy, and serve as a bulwark and safeguard of the nation. Valuing most highly, as he did, the commercial prosperity of the United States, he considered that a new spring would be given to all its enterprise, by the acquisition of Louisiana. Our skill in commerce and dispatch in navigation would overmatch and bear down all the competition of the French and Spaniards. A more cordial union would be promoted between the Western and Eastern States; who would then be connected by the strong ties of commerce and interest, as well as of law and policy; and the jealousies, by which attempts had been made to divide them, and which had been raised to a mountainous magnitude, would be entirely levelled and done away. He was confident that all the Atlantic seaports, and, beyond all, the great commercial city which he represented, would participate largely of the benefits flowing from our complete sovereignty of the Mississippi and all its waters.

Mr. M. then applauded the mild and dignified conduct of an Administration, which had accomplished these great events by peaceful means, rather than war; and concluded, that if in the course of his observations he had not been successful in convincing the understandings of the gentlemen who thought differently from him, he had at least expressed some of the reasons which governed his judgment and would guide his vote on the proposition then depending. He hoped the resolution would be agreed to, for making immediate preparatory provision to take possession of Louisiana, according to the stipulations of the treaty.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that a sense of duty alone could have induced him to rise at that late hour. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to a stipulation in the Treaty of London. [Here Mr. R. read an extract from the third article of that treaty, whereby the United States are pledged not to impose on imports in British vessels from their territories in America, adjacent to the United States, any higher duties than would be paid upon such imports, if brought into our Atlantic ports in American bottoms.] In this case, he said, gentlemen could not avail themselves of the distinction taken by his friend from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) between a Territory and a State, even if they were so disposed,—since the ports in question were ports of a State. The ports of New York, on the Lakes, were as much ports of that State, as the city of New York itself; they had their custom-house officers, were governed by the same regulations, as other ports,—duties were exacted at them; and yet, under the article of the British Treaty which had been just read, British bottoms could and did enter them subject to no higher duties than were paid by American bottoms in the Atlantic ports. Mr. R. said that he did not mean to affirm that this exemption made by the Treaty of London was Constitutional, so long as a distinction prevailed between American and British bottoms in other ports. He had never given a vote to carry that treaty into effect—but he hoped the gentlemen from Connecticut—both of whom he believed had done so; one of whom, at least, he knew had been a conspicuous advocate of that treaty—he hoped that gentleman (Mr. GRISWOLD) would inform the Committee how he got over the constitutional objection to this article of the Treaty of London, which he had endeavored to urge against that under discussion. How could the gentleman, with the opinion which he now holds, agree to admit British bottoms into certain ports, on the same terms on which American bottoms were admitted into American ports, generally? Thereby making that very difference,—giving that very preference to those particular ports of certain States, which he tells us cannot constitutionally be given to the ports of New Orleans—although that port is not within any State, and, if his (Mr. GRISWOLD's) doctrine be correct, not even within the United States!

The gentleman from Connecticut professed a wish that this important discussion should be conducted with moderation and candor. In this sentiment he concurred. He was therefore altogether unprepared, after this preamble, to hear the gentleman from Connecticut represent the treaty in question as conceding the most valuable commercial privileges to France and Spain, and thereby sapping the very foundation of our own carrying trade. In the spirit of candor the stipulations in question would be viewed, not as conceding advantages in trade to those nations, but as securing them to ourselves. The article in question did indeed profess to grant, for a limited time, to French and Spanish vessels, laden with the products of their respective countries, admission into the ports of the ceded territory, on equal terms with our own ships. But, although nominally an advantage has been conceded to these nations, substantially their situation was changed for the worse, and the benefit in fact conferred on us. For what were our rights in these ports, and what were theirs, setting aside the treaty? The treaty then had rendered our situation more eligible and theirs less so. How then could gentlemen declare that it was calculated to injure our carrying trade? When by it our trade was put on the footing of absolute security, while that of France and Spain was admitted under considerable restrictions, enjoying in but one particular, and for twelve years only, an equality with ours. Their trade, before on so superior a footing, had descended from its pre-eminence in privilege, and given way to ours; and yet gentlemen warn us of the destruction of our carrying trade, and commercial prosperity, from the very source which has enlarged and secured both. The enemies of the treaty, therefore, are the advocates of the trade of France and Spain, and the enemies so far of our own. Since, by retaining things in their present posture, they would continue to those nations the superior advantages which they now enjoy in the ports of Louisiana, they would continue the restrictions which heretofore have fettered our commerce to that country, and they would refuse to put our trade on a footing superior to that of France and Spain.

But while gentlemen endeavor to alarm us with the idea of this formidable competition, I cannot, sir, feel a moment's apprehension from this quarter. Exclusive of the limitation of twelve years, and the restriction that their cargoes shall be of French or Spanish growth or manufacture, who that considered the present condition and future prospects of those countries could regard them as formidable commercial competitors? Was there not infinitely greater probability that the third article of the Treaty of London, which had no limitation as to time, and embraced our whole frontier on the side of Canada, would enable Great Britain to supply that frontier on terms as cheap, or cheaper, than we ourselves could?

With more candor, however, the gentleman has boldly avowed that he was among the number of those who, at the last session of Congress, were for pursuing "vigorous measures" for enforcing our rights in relation to the Mississippi. What those vigorous measures were, the House would be at no loss to determine. The gentleman had disdained to deny his principles. He would not now shrink from what he had then advocated, and Mr. R. said that he applauded him for it.

Mr. R. said that the gentleman had laid his premises a great way off, as if from the expectation that they would not be closely examined, and that therefore there would be nothing to oppose to the conclusions which he had drawn from them. He had stated a case scarcely supposable, and from it inferred the very principle in question. His whole argument was founded on presuming the very principle to be granted which was in dispute. The United States, says he, cannot incorporate into the Union Great Britain or France; and therefore they cannot unite to themselves the colonies of either nation. If the gentleman meant to prove the impolicy or impracticability of adding France or England to the United States, no one, he believed, was disposed to question the justice of his remark. But the position in contest was, can the United States constitutionally extend their limits? And this point in dispute the gentleman takes for granted by saying, that we cannot extend our dominion over England or France, and therefore cannot acquire dominion in any other country. That is, we cannot, because we cannot.

On the subject of expediency, the gentleman had undervalued the country west of the Mississippi, and had declared that he considered the barren province of Florida as more important to us. Mr. R. asked if the country west of the Mississippi were not valuable, according to the gentleman's own statement, since it afforded the means of acquiring Florida, which he prized so highly, from Spain? He had no doubt of the readiness of that Power to relinquish Florida, in itself a dead expense to her—only valuable as an outwork to her other possessions, and now insulated by those of the United States—for a very small portion of the country which we claimed in virtue of the treaty under discussion. He said that he stated early in the debate, and had stated truly, that the limits of Louisiana were not actually defined; but, nevertheless, we were not without some light on this interesting subject. Thirty years before the Spaniards made their settlement of the Adais, the French had established themselves on the bay of St. Bernard or St. Louis—the nearest Spanish colony being then on the river Panuco, one hundred leagues to the west. The great river of the North, as nearly equidistant between the Panuco and bay of St. Bernard was—on the principle generally admitted by European nations forming establishments in savage countries—considered by France as the boundary between French and Spanish America, and accordingly we find it so laid down in many of the old maps. This boundary would embrace within the limits of Louisiana some very valuable dominions of Spain, including the rich mines of St. Barbe, and the city of Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico. On the other hand, in virtue of her settlement of the Adais, Spain might claim the country as far east as the river Mexicana, and to the highlands dividing the waters of the North river from those of the Mississippi. Beyond them she could have no color of claim. In settling this important barrier, there were ample materials for the acquisition of Florida, still retaining to ourselves all the country watered by the Mississippi.

Another gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) had declared that if the inhabitants of the ceded territory were now, or should hereafter be, admitted into the Union, it would be a violation of that clause of the Constitution which relates to the establishment of an uniform rule of naturalization, since those people will be converted from foreigners to citizens, not in the mode prescribed by our naturalization law. Mr. R. wished to know in what manner the subjects of Great Britain settled around our western posts were admitted to the privilege of citizenship? Whether it was not done by treaty, and not in the mode prescribed by law? How did the people at Natchez become entitled to the rights of citizens? Although born out of our allegiance, the moment our Government was established over them, did they not possess of right a security for their lives and property? Could they not demand trial by jury in case of criminal prosecution? When he spoke of their acquiring the rights of citizens, he did not mean in the full extent in which they were enjoyed by citizens of any one of the particular States; since they possessed not the right of self-government, but those rights of personal liberty, of personal security, and of property, which were among the dearest privileges of our citizens. A stipulation to incorporate the ceded country does not imply that we are bound ever to admit them to the unqualified enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship. It is a covenant to incorporate them into our Union—not on the footing of the original States, or of States created under the Constitution—but to extend to them, according to the principles of the Constitution, the rights and immunities of citizens, being those rights and immunities of jury trial, liberty of conscience, &c., which every citizen may challenge, whether he be a citizen of an individual State, or of a territory subordinate to and dependent on those States in their corporate capacity. In the meantime they are to be protected in the enjoyment of their existing rights. There is no stipulation, however, that they shall ever be formed into one or more States.

He denied the correctness of the doctrine advanced by the same gentleman, that the stipulation entered into by France, in time of war, to raise the Duke of Parma to the throne of Etruria, bound her to obtain a recognition of that King from every Power of Europe. All which concerned us in that treaty had been recited in ours with France. By the Treaty of St. Ildefonso His Catholic Majesty stipulates "to redeliver (retroceder) to the French Republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein relative to his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana." What these stipulations were is certainly known only to the parties themselves, for they never were officially made public, although we are at no loss to conjecture them. Nor are we at all concerned whether France has or has not complied with them. Because in a treaty executed at Madrid, six months after, in March, 1801, they show that they consider the former treaty as having passed the title to the country to France. The fifth article is as follows:

"This treaty being in pursuance of that already concluded between the First Consul and His Catholic Majesty, by which the King delivers to France possession of Louisiana, the contracting parties agree to carry into effect the said treaty," &c.

Spain, therefore, being satisfied as to the stipulations entered into by France in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, declares herself in the second treaty ready to redeliver the country to her whenever she was ready to receive it, and Mr. R. said, he had it from high authority that the royal mandate to that effect was in the hands of the Minister of the French Republic near the United States, and would be forwarded to the existing government of Louisiana so soon as the treaty should be confirmed on our part.

Having departed considerably from the particular point on which he wished to be satisfied by the gentleman from Connecticut, who had spoken first (Mr. GRISWOLD,) he would again recall the attention of that gentleman to the third article of the Treaty of London, and request that he would reconcile its provisions to the doctrine which he had advanced on the seventh article of the treaty then before the Committee.

The Committee now rose, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. DAWSON reported that the Committee had, according to order, had the said message, treaty, conventions, and motion, under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same were read, as follows.

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for carrying into effect the treaty and conventions concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic.

2. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President, of the twenty-first instant, as relates to the establishment of a Provisional Government over the Territory acquired by the United States, in virtue of the treaty and conventions lately negotiated with the French Republic, be referred to a select committee; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

3. Resolved, That so much of the aforesaid conventions as relates to the payment, by the United States, of sixty millions of francs to the French Republic, and to the payment, by the United States, of debts due by France to citizens of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions at the Clerk's table: Whereupon the first resolution being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House—yeas 90, nays 25, as follows:

Mitchell, Thomas Plater, Joshua Sands, John Cotton Smith, William Stedman, James Stephenson, Samuel Taggart, Samuel Tenney, Samuel Thatcher, Peleg Wadsworth, and Lemuel Williams.

The second resolution being again read, and amended at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the twenty-first instant, as relates to the occupation and establishment of a Provisional Government over the Territory acquired by the United States, in virtue of the treaty and conventions lately negotiated with the French Republic, be referred to a select committee; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Jr., Mr. JOHN RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. HOGE, Mr. GAYLORD GRISWOLD, and Mr. BEDINGER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The third resolution reported from the Committee of the whole House, being again read, was agreed to by the House.

WEDNESDAY, October 26.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to examine the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, made a report in part thereupon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of sundry inhabitants of the two western counties of the Indiana Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, stating certain inconveniences and embarrassments to which the petitioners have been and are now subjected, in consequence of their connexion, under the same Government, with the eastern extremity of the said Territory; and praying that, whenever Congress in their wisdom may think proper to establish a Territorial Government for the district of country called Upper Louisiana, the petitioners and other inhabitants of the said two western counties may be connected under the same Territorial Government.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and other papers, transmitted to the Clerk from Fluvanna county, in the State of Virginia, touching the election of Thomas Mann Randolph, one of the members returned to serve in this House, for the said State; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. TENNEY, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine the Journal of the last session, and report therefrom such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined, made a report in part thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was yesterday referred "so much of the treaty and conventions, lately negotiated with the French Republic, as relates to the payment by the United States of sixty millions of frances to the French Republic, and to the payment by the United States of debts due by France to citizens of the United States," have leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee last mentioned, presented a bill for carrying into effect the conventions of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April last, and for the temporary government thereof;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. CLOPTON addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to solicit the indulgence of the Committee a few minutes. Having had the honor to propose an amendment to the report of the select committee, and having failed of obtaining it, I feel a wish to state my reasons why I am in favor of the principle of the provision contained in the report; the principle of designating the persons voted for as President and Vice President. Sir, the propriety, the eligibility, and the importance of such a provision, appear to my mind so plain, and so obvious, as scarcely to require a single argument to support it. Nevertheless, plain and obvious as I think it is, it does not meet with universal approbation; inasmuch as it contemplates a material alteration in one of the provisions of the Constitution, and an important provision too, inasmuch as it may involve consequences of vast moment to the happiness and tranquillity of this country. I trust the Committee will pardon me for troubling them with a statement of the principal grounds of my opinion in favor of the resolution. I promise the Committee that I will not utter a single word but what applies directly to the principle of the resolution. Every sentence shall be a reason why I am in favor of that principle. I am in favor of the resolution because it is perfectly congenial with the most essential principles of our Government, even the principle of representation. For, sir, in a Government constituted as our Government is, wherein all the constituted authorities are the agents of the people, the suffrages given for the election of those agents ought ever to be a complete expression of the public will, and should therefore be directed immediately to those persons in whom the Electors intend to place confidence, as their agents, in the particular offices for which the elections are made. An election, therefore, which may, from the mode of holding it, terminate ultimately in the appointment of a different person to an office, than the one originally intended for it by a majority of the Electors, cannot be said to be such complete expression of the public will. When one person is intended for an office and another person actually obtains it, such election, if indeed it can properly be called an election, is not conformable to the will of those by whom it was made. No sir, it is contrary to it. The effect resulting from the act of the majority, in such a case, would be completely at variance with the will of that majority in performing the act. Such an event would indeed exhibit a case in which the will of the majority would be defeated by the act of the majority in the very exercise of its elective franchise. I think, sir, I can prove that such a consequence may result from the present mode of choosing the President and Vice President of the United States. I think I can prove it in the following manner: I will suppose that four persons, A, B, C, and D, shall be held up for candidates. I will then suppose that ninety-five Electors shall prefer A for President, and vote for him with the intent to elect him to that office, and that the other eighty-one Electors shall prefer B for President and accordingly vote for him. I will suppose also that, of the ninety-five Electors, who prefer A for President seventy-five shall also prefer C for Vice President, and give him their votes with that intent, and that the other twenty Electors shall prefer D for that office. Lastly, I will suppose that of the eighty-one Electors who prefer B for President, twenty-five shall also prefer C for Vice President, and accordingly vote for him; and that the other fifty-six shall prefer D for that office. Now, because seventy-five of those ninety-five Electors who prefer A for President and twenty-five of those who prefer B for President, are also willing that C should be Vice President, and vote for him with that intent, C actually becomes President with one hundred votes, not one of which was given to him for that purpose. Thus the will of ninety-five, who compose a clear decided majority of the whole number of Electors, is defeated by seventy-five of their own votes, together with the other twenty-five votes given to C; that is to say, the will of the majority is defeated by the act of the majority, in the very exercise of its electoral capacity. But, Mr. Chairman, if the proposed amendment should be adopted, this anomalous effect cannot then result; for, as each of the candidates would then be designated for the particular office for which he was intended, ninety-five votes would be given to A for President; eighty-one would be given to B for President; one hundred to C for Vice President; and seventy-six to D for Vice President. So that A would then be elected President, according to the real will and intention of ninety-five Electors, by a majority equal to the difference between eighty-one and ninety-five; and C would be elected Vice President agreeably to the will and intention of one hundred Electors, by a majority equal to the difference between seventy-six and one hundred.

Mr. Chairman, such an event as that which I have stated as a possible, and, perhaps, a probable result, from the present mode of choosing the President and Vice President of the United States, must be a serious evil. In no point of view can I contemplate it, in which it does not present itself as an evil of considerable magnitude. For, sir, however respectful the public attention might have been towards the person who thus becomes Chief Magistrate of the Union, contrary to the intention of the Electors, contrary to the public sentiment, contrary to the public will, it cannot be expected that with the acquisition of the office, under these circumstances, he will receive the public confidence. It is not the nature of Governments as purely elective as this Government is, to produce a spirit altogether acquiescent in elections of this sort. It is not in this country, where the elective principle is so highly revered, so warmly cherished, and so dearly valued, that we are to look for a disposition in the public mind to feel itself satisfied with the introduction of agents into office, who are not the objects of its choice. Even in respect to departments of inferior consideration, this disposition is not to be found; much less can it be expected to appear and display itself, should the great and important duties of the Chief Executive Magistrate, by an appointment thus brought about, be devolved on a person not contemplated for that station. It is, indeed, the nature of elective representative Governments to produce a very different spirit, a spirit of dissatisfaction, under such appointments. Or, more properly may it be said, sir, that in all such Governments there is a spirit coeval in existence with the Governments themselves, which disposes the people rather to withhold their affection from public functionaries, than to bestow it upon them, when introduced into office after this manner. It is inseparable from the people of all countries, where the elective system prevails in any degree. Its influence and activity, ever commensurate with the degree of perfection which pervades that system, proportionably diffuse themselves through the great body of the people. Wherever genuine rational liberty most abounds (and I believe, sir, that so far from abounding, it cannot exist at all, where election and representation do not exist,) there this spirit abounds in like degree; there it is to be traced through all the departments of life; there it animates the mass of the community; there it spreads. It extends and enlarges its sphere of action through the whole circle of society, and that influence is exerted to a degree of prevalence in proportion as the principles of that liberty actuate the public mind. It is not the spirit of a wild and furious licentiousness, thirsting for the destruction of law and of order. It is not a spirit which aims to loosen the bands of society, or to weaken the sanctions of law. No, sir, it breathes quite a different wish. It believes that the strength of the one and the efficacy of the other of these essential means of human happiness are best secured in the agency of those organs of public authority whose creation springs from the public will; and, believing this, wishes that the elective principle in its practical operations may be directed through the channel of that public will. It believes that such direction of this great, this important, this inestimable principle is necessary to give full effect to the representative system, on which depends the attainment of all the great desiderata of a free Government—everything truly desirable in Government. And where, sir, does this spirit more abound than in America? Where does it so much abound? Is it not the pride and the boast of Americans? Sir, I believe it is. I believe, too, it is a laudable, an honorable pride. It is a great, leading, characteristic sentiment which pervades the American mind—which dignifies and adorns this country—which constitutes the very germ of true American greatness. It is that which operates as the source of everything which spreads forth the lustre and the glory with which this nation is surrounded. It is the life, the soul, of the Republic. It is that vivid flame which warms and cherishes, and gives to the body politic its just and proper and natural impulse, and directs its course towards the true end of the social institution—the universal good. I believe, therefore, Mr. Chairman, it must be a consideration of primary importance that the modes of election be so established that in their event they may always secure a full expression of the public will, and the appointment of all public agents conformably thereto.

OCTOBER, 1803.

With these impressions on my mind, Mr. Chairman, and from the evident risk attendant on the present mode of choosing the President and Vice President of the United States, that the election of those high and important officers of the Government may terminate contrary to the public will, I am thoroughly convinced of the expediency of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, directing a designation of them in the electoral votes.

Sir, the case which I had the honor to state to the Committee as possibly, and perhaps probably, resulting from the present mode of election, is a case wherein a decided majority of the electoral votes shall have been given to one of the candidates, though not according to the intention of the Electors who gave them. But, sir, what can we expect to be the public sensation in a case wherein an equal number of votes shall have been given to each of two candidates, and this House shall finally decide the election by rejecting that candidate for the Presidency, who was intended for it by a majority of the people and of the Electors, and choosing the other candidate who was not so intended for that office? The first mentioned circumstance of such a case we have already witnessed; and, sir, should I mistake the circumstance, were I to say we had mournfully witnessed it? And what, sir, would have been the condition of these States, if, when assembled at this Capitol, by their Representatives, they had continued so divided in their votes that no actual election of a President had taken place, although the public sentiment had been clearly and unequivocally pronounced in favor of one of the candidates? There was every reason to believe, sir, that gloomy indeed would have been the prospect!

A long train of evils incalculable in their consequences could hardly have failed to overspread the face of this delightful country! Indeed, sir, what would have been the ultimate issue it is not within the compass of human foresight to divine. This great, this flourishing country, which at this time pours forth innumerable streams of prosperity, displaying in vast and rich variety every means of individual happiness, every means of national happiness, and every means of true national glory, instead of exhibiting the present pleasing, animating prospect, before this period might have been enveloped in dark and dismal clouds of confusion, disorder, and political distraction! The bands of society being thus in a manner broken asunder, and all the angry turbulent passions incident to man left unrestrained, what fatal consequences might be expected to follow! What violence of party, what rage of ambition, what dreadful commotions, might be expected to agitate this then unfortunate country! And, sir, is there a single American living whose blood is so far chilled with indifference concerning the fate of this country, that he would not be stricken with awful alarm at the prospect of such an event—an event tending directly to produce so complete a state of anarchy with all its concomitant calamities? No, sir, no! I would hope, I would persuade myself, Mr. Chairman, there is not one. Nevertheless, although the spirit of patriotism might have predominated over that of party in the case which has happened—determined the election, and determined it conformably to the public sentiment—yet, sir, have we any infallible security that, in all future times, should any similar case occur, the same regard for the peace, the tranquillity, and happiness of this great community will retain the ascendancy and arrest the evil? The mournful experience of ages, transmitted to us through the page of history, teaches an awful lesson that such security cannot be expected. I am seriously impressed with this sentiment, therefore, that it behooves us to let it be a work of the present day to guard against so great an evil by removing from the Constitution the means whereby it may be accomplished.

But suppose, sir, in the case alluded to, the election had terminated otherwise than it did, is there a single man in existence who believes that such election would have been hailed by the public voice with any degree of complacency? Innumerable, sir, and strong were the evidences of a contrary operation on the public mind; innumerable and strong were the evidences that such an event would have been very unfortunate—would have produced much more of the public indignation than of the public approbation—although it would have been better than no election at all. And there can be no manner of question, sir, that if, in any future election, a similar case should occur, and such should be the ultimate event, whoever might be the candidates, a very disagreeable effect would be wrought upon the public mind; that whenever such an event should happen, it would call forth the public indignation.

Should it be objected, Mr. Chairman, that even if the proposed amendment should be adopted and become a part of the Constitution, it will not make such provision as would, in all future elections, secure a majority of electoral votes to be given to some one or other of the candidates, and thereby preclude the necessity of ever again resorting to a vote of this House for a final decision; it must be acknowledged that no provision whatever can be made so as to have that operation; but if, in any election, no person should have a majority of electoral votes, a Legislative decision in such a case cannot possibly be attended with the same disagreeable consequences as such a decision might be attended with in a case happening under the existing mode, similar to that which has been cited; for, if the amendment should be adopted, inasmuch as each of the candidates would then be designated by the electoral votes for the particular office for which he was intended, and consequently thus pointed out as being so far the objects of public choice, on whomsoever of them the ultimate election should fall, the successful candidate, I apprehend, would be more acceptable to the public mind than any person could be who had not been contemplated for President by any of the Electors. Such public approbation I consider, sir, as a circumstance of incalculable importance in such an election. I hope, therefore, the resolution will be agreed to, and obtain the sanction of a full Constitutional majority.

The Committee rose, and reported a resolution thereupon, which was twice read, amended, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the different States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

"In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President; of whom, one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person voted for as President having a majority of the votes of all the Electors appointed, shall be the President; and if there shall be no person having such majority, the President shall be chosen from the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list for President, by the House of Representatives, in the manner directed by the Constitution. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President; and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons as Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution."

THURSDAY, October 27.

Another member, to wit: ABRAM TRIGG, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Ordered, That the resolution agreed to yesterday, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, proposing an article of amendment to the Constitution, respecting future elections of President and Vice President, be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

A memorial and petition of the Illinois and Ouabache Land Companies was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will consider and ultimately decide on their memorial presented to this House on the eleventh of March, one thousand eight hundred and two, in such manner as may be deemed equitable and proper.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition do lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred so much of the treaty and conventions lately negotiated with the French Republic as relates to "the payment by the United States of debts due by France to citizens of the United States," have leave to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee last mentioned, presented a bill making provision for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, the payment of which has been assumed by the United States, by virtue of the convention of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. LYON observed that the country in which he lived had been for some time supplied with salt and lead from the Louisiana country, on which articles considerable and burdensome duties are imposed. For the purpose of liberating the citizens from these duties, he moved a resolution, declaring it expedient that provision should be made for suspending the collection of all duties on articles imported into the ports of the United States from the territory ceded to the United States by the Louisiana convention, with the view of having it submitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. J. CLAY, after observing on the proceedings of yesterday in respect to the future mode of election of President and Vice President, said he should move an amendment to strike out the word three, and insert the word five.

Mr. DAWSON said that a motion, in substance, to the same purpose, had been presented to the House yesterday, and rejected. He felt no anxiety whether the House, in case of equal votes for President and Vice President, was confined to three or five; but it was his wish that the least alteration possible should be made in the Constitution, as first framed. Under this consideration, the insertion of the word three was, in his opinion, the least of the alterations proposed. He thought that making the choice out of five, was guarding against what might perhaps never happen. He should, however, feel little difficulty in voting for either.

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

Mr. NICHOLSON declared that it was unnecessary to take up the time of the Committee. The gentleman who moved the amendment tells us that five is the least deviation. He could not agree to this. It did not in the least affect the choice of a Vice President.

Mr. SMILE considered it a duty due to himself to assert that his sentiments through the whole of this business were uniform. He thought that he could discern that the Chairman was surprised at the deviation from the original opinion of some gentlemen. His present sentiments he had declared before the select committee, and to these he still adhered. He said he would vote in any way, so that an opinion might be had; and the less they deviated, the safer they were. He had no object in view but the public good. He was extremely tenacious in altering the Constitution, but, without the spirit of accommodation, they could never agree upon a number. If one gentleman, to indulge himself, persisted in the number three, and others of five, he knew not when an opinion could be obtained.

Mr. ELLIOT said that he would engross the attention of the Committee but a moment, and he would not ask for that moment if he did not think that what he had to offer would facilitate an accommodation. Some gentlemen, he observed, were so tenacious of the number being five, that, unless they were indulged, they would never make an amendment. He would therefore vote for that number, in order to promote his desired accommodation.

The question was taken for inserting the word five—ayes 59, noes 47.

On motion, the Committee rose, and the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, when the question was again put and carried. It was then moved that the amendments be engrossed, and that a third reading be had to-day. Agreed to.

LOUISIANA TREATY

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled; "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April last, and for other purposes."

The bill having been read, by paragraphs, as follows:

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of and occupy the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris, on the thirtieth day of April last, between the two nations; and that he may for that purpose, and in order to maintain in the said territories the authority of the United States, employ any part of the army and navy of the United States, and of the force authorized by an act passed the third day of March last, entitled, "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals," which he may deem necessary; and so much of the sum appropriated by the said acts as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying this act into effect; to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, until Congress shall have made provision for the temporary government of the said Territories, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said he was apprized that the bill was of such a nature as seemed to delegate to the President of the United States a power the exercise of which was intended to have but a short duration; he was also aware that some such power was necessary to be vested in the Executive, to enable him to take possession of the country ceded by France. But he could conceive no cause for giving a latitude, as to time, so extensive as that allowed by the second section, which says, that "until Congress shall have made provision for the temporary government of the said territories, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct." If we give this power out of our hands, it may be irrevocable until Congress shall have made legislative provision; that is, a single branch of the Government, the Executive branch, with a small minority of either House, may prevent its resumption. He did not believe that, under any circumstances, it was proper to delegate to the Executive a power so extensive; but if proper under certain circumstances, he was sure it was improper under present circumstances. As he conceived it proper to deal out power to the Executive with as sparing a hand as was consistent with the public good, he should move an amendment to substitute in the place of the words "Congress shall have made provision for the temporary government of the said territories"—these words, "the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress." So that if Congress shall make provision for the government of the territory at any time during the session, the power of the President will cease, and at any rate at the expiration of the session. In other words, this amendment will compel Congress to take early measures for reducing this enormous power, delegated to the Executive, by the establishment of a government for the people of Louisiana.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the whole of the second section, which would supersede the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. He made this motion to obtain an explanation respecting the nature and extent of the delegated power. That section provides "that until Congress shall have made provision for the temporary government of the said territories, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such manner, as the President of the 'United States shall direct." I wish to know, said Mr. Griswold, whether any gentleman can inform me what the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing province are; for we are about to confirm them, and direct their execution by the authorities of the United States.

It is probable that some of them may be inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. We have certain restrictions on powers exercised under it. For instance, that the habeas corpus shall not be suspended in cases of invasion or rebellion, and a variety of other restraints. It is for this reason that I think we ought to have some knowledge of the powers exercised in Louisiana, before we confirm them in the lump; and in order to obtain this information, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. ELLIOT rose to second the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, and to express his coincidence in the sentiments of that gentleman on this subject. He would never consent to delegate, for a single moment, such extensive powers to the President, even over a Territory. Such a delegation of power was unconstitutional. If such a provision as that contemplated by the section were necessary, it became Congress itself to enter upon the task of legislation.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH had hoped that some other member would have given the gentleman from Connecticut the satisfaction he asked in relation to the provisions of the section proposed to be stricken out. No one having risen, he would do it himself as well as he was able. That gentleman asks whether we know the civil, military, and judicial powers that subsist in Louisiana; and contends that it is necessary we should know them before they are transferred to the Executive of the United States. If the section were to stand as it now does, Mr. R. said he would be as unwilling as the gentleman from Connecticut to agree to it. But, with the proposed limitation, he saw no substantial objection to it. He was one of those who did not know with precision what the subsisting civil, military, and judicial powers exercised in Louisiana were; and yet he saw not the difficulty which the gentleman had stated, as to the temporary transfer of the powers to the Executive with the limitation proposed—And wherefore? Because, in the nature of things, it was almost impossible to take possession of the country without the exercise of such powers at some point of time, and if they should be exercised but for a single moment, such exercise would be as hostile to the principles of the gentleman as the exercise of them for a whole year.

I ask, said Mr. R., whether if the country should be taken possession of on the principles advocated by the gentleman on a former day, these powers would not all have attached to the Executive? Suppose instead of assuming the civil government of the territory, it had been taken possession of by storm, by an army of 40 or 50,000 soldiers—Will the gentlemen contend that under such circumstances, the privilege of the habeas corpus or trial by jury would have been invaded? Undoubtedly not. If the gentleman will advert with precision to the first section, he will perceive that it is contemplated to take possession in such a manner as will give the United States security in that possession. For though we might not doubt the disposition of the Government of France to give us a secure possession, or apprehend difficulty from any other quarter, yet it would be recollected that there were citizens or subjects in the territory requiring some government. It was not impossible that on taking possession there may be some turbulent spirits, who, having at heart the advancement of personal schemes, may be disposed to resist. It would be unwise then in Congress to delay making the requisite provision, until necessity claimed it, and until, perhaps, after Congress had adjourned.

Gentlemen will see the absolute necessity of the path chalked out by the Senate. They will see the necessity of the United States taking possession of the country in the capacity of sovereigns, in the same extent as that of the existing government of the province. After having taken possession, and being in the secure enjoyment of the country, it will be extremely proper to guard against any apprehended Executive invasion of right. This step will then be politic, and it will be observed that the section as amended enjoins this duty upon Congress. If, however, the gentleman from Connecticut will show us any way in which the country may be taken possession of, with security, and by which the people may enjoy all the rights and franchises of citizens of the United States immediately, I shall be happy to give it the sanction of my vote. But to my mind this appears impossible.

Mr. GRISWOLD thought it extraordinary that the gentleman from Virginia should call upon him to propose a plan for avoiding the difficulties that would apparently result from the system proposed by the bill; when it had only that day been laid upon their tables, and had been yesterday refused to be referred to a select committee; and of consequence, no time for reflection had been allowed. Under these circumstances, it was indeed extraordinary that he should be expected to propose a plan. He confessed he was unable to offer any. To do it would doubtless require time and deliberation. It was sufficient for him that the bill infringed the Constitution. By the second section it is proposed to transfer to the President of the United States all the powers, civil, military, and judicial, exercised at present in that province. What are those powers? No gentleman is able to inform me. It may be presumed that they are legislative; the President, therefore, is to be made the legislator of that country: that they are judicial; the President, therefore, is to be made judge: that they are executive, and so far they constitutionally devolve on the President. Hence we are about making the President the legislator, the judge, and the executive of this territory. I do not said Mr. G., understand that, according to the Constitution, we have a right to make him legislator, judge, and executive, in any territory belonging to the United States. Though, therefore, on this occasion I feel no jealousy of the abuse of the powers conferred on the President, yet I cannot agree to them, because I consider them repugnant to the Constitution.

The argument that the powers are necessary, though unconstitutional, is no argument with me. If gentlemen can so explain the section, as to show to the satisfaction of the Committee that it is competent to this House to transfer to the President all these powers, I shall have no objection to the section; but until this is done, it is my duty to vote for striking it out. And though it is impossible for me, at this moment, to devise a plan for overcoming these difficulties, yet I trust, if time be allowed, there will be found wisdom enough in the Committee to devise one. To the first section, authorizing the taking possession of the country, so far as I can understand it, I can see no objection.

Mr. NICHOLSON was opposed to striking out the second section, as he did not perceive the evils contemplated by the gentleman from Connecticut. The question is, whether we shall take immediate possession of this country, or wait till this body shall have time to form such a government as shall be hereafter likely to render the people happy, under laws according to the provisions of the Constitution? I think, said Mr. N. it will be injudicious to delay taking the possession, until such a government shall be formed. The only question then that can be started is, whether the second section of this bill violates the Constitution. On this point I differ entirely from the gentleman from Connecticut. I do not see in it any violation of the Constitution. The gentleman supposes that by adopting the provisions of the second section we shall vest all the civil, military, and judicial powers of the existing Government of Louisiana in the President. But it clearly is not so. We vest in him the appointment of the persons who shall exercise these powers, but we do not delegate to him the exercise of the powers themselves. Is there any difference between this, and the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, which relates to territorial governments? By that ordinance, and I have never heard its constitutionality questioned, all the civil, military, and judicial powers are vested in such persons as the President may appoint. Judicial powers are vested in persons appointed by the President; so with respect to the civil and military powers; and the legislative powers are vested in a body, part of which is appointed by the President. I am, with other gentlemen, unable to say what are the nature and extent of the powers exercised by the present Government of Louisiana. But we must authorize the taking possession of the country, and we must on such an event, authorize the exercise of these powers, viz: the exercise of military power by an army, the judicial powers by judges, and the other necessary powers by other officers; and unless Congress shall divest the President of the power of appointing these officers, it will be vested in him by the Constitution. I repeat it; these powers are not delegated to the President, but to such persons as he may appoint. I know the old axiom, qui facit per alium facit per se; but it does not apply in this case. It is possible that these appointments may be conferred on persons in the ceded country, or the persons may be sent from the Atlantic States, or from the Mississippi Territory; but be this as it may, some persons must be appointed to exercise these powers until Congress shall establish a new government.

Mr. MITCHILL expressed his wish that the section of the bill might stand. To strike it out would be to make void all the proceedings respecting the province of Louisiana, on which Congress had been engaged with so much care and diligence. We had purchased the country, and made arrangements to pay for it; and now, with the consent of France, possession is to be taken; when behold! an objection is made to that part of the intended statute which confers on the President the power to occupy and hold it peaceably for the nation.

The motion to obliterate the second section of the bill, is grounded on the danger to be apprehended from an enlargement of the Presidential power. And it is alleged that if the section should receive the vote of the House, all military, civil, and judicial authority would be thereby centered in the Executive. It was declared to be unconstitutional in Congress to delegate such vast unlimited authority; and, even if the Constitution permitted it, there would be great indiscretion in the delegation of such power.

For his own part, Mr. M. said, he was strictly tenacious of the rights reserved to the people. He was equally regardful of the privileges belonging to the States. He was a zealous advocate too, of the powers secured to the National Legislature by the Constitution. In taking possession of the ceded country, in the manner proposed by the bill, there was no violation of the rights of the citizens, no usurpation of the privileges of the republics, nor any infraction of the great national deed of settlement. The jealousy expressed by some gentlemen against the accumulation of excessive power in the Chief Executive Magistrate was excited by slight circumstances. Mr. M. was totally averse to the creation of a dictator; nor did he discern any thing tyrannical or depotic lurking in the paragraph which had been spoken of in such odious terms. The mischief complained of was rather imaginary than real.

But, let it be examined fairly what Congress are meditating to do. The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution contemplates that territory and other property may belong to the United States. By a treaty with France the nation has lately acquired title to a new territory, with various kinds of public property on it or annexed to it. By the same section of the Constitution, Congress is clothed with the power to dispose of such territory and property, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting it. This is as fair an exercise of Constitutional authority as that by which we assemble and hold our seats in this House. To the title thus obtained, we wish now to add the possession; and it is proposed that for this important purpose, the President shall be duly empowered. There is no person in the nation to whom this can be so properly confided as to the President. Besides, being the head of the Executive department, he is indebted for his promotion to that exalted place to the suffrages of electors chosen from the people. And the people of the United States can have no serious or solid objection to the part of the bill now proposed to be expunged, which authorizes the man of their confidence and choice to take possession of Louisiana in their behalf.

It has been said that all civil, military and judicial powers are to be consolidated and confounded in the President. There is no such thing meditated, Mr. Chairman, in the bill. The President is not to officiate in either of those capacities personally in Louisiana. He is only to direct in whom the authority now existing in the French or Spanish officers of the province shall vest when our Government shall have gained the possession of it; and in what manner that authority so transferred shall be exercised by those to whom it shall be by him delegated. In all this, the President does not so much himself act, as he puts other persons in a condition to act. In the accomplishment of the object the President would indeed provide for the performance of civil, judicial, and military duties; but in effecting these he would only appoint the others and give directions as to their manner of proceeding, but he would not himself be either a legislator, a judge, or a colonel of the island of New Orleans. He was in short only the organ by which certain acts necessary to be done, and incidental to gaining the actual possession of the country, could be performed. And if ever the plea of adopting measures de necessitate could be made, it was on such an occasion as this.

Mr. M. then drew a parallel, which he hoped would be agreeable to the opposers of the bill, between the powers intended to be vested in the President of the United States and those which, according to the law and usage of England, were inherent in the King. According to the true theory of the British constitution, the Sovereign was the chief judiciary officer and president in his courts; he was also the head of the established Church, and of course the great spiritual President of the realm; in him, also, were deposited the important concerns of war and peace. The writs were tested in his name, yet it was notorious that he nowadays never went personally and took a seat on the bench. He did not take upon himself the performance of sacerdotal functions, nor act the part of a bishop or archdeacon. Neither did he go forth into the field of battle, and do the duties of a general or a quartermaster. Yet the King had a qualified superintendence over all these great departments of the public business, which it was not expected he should perform in person, but cause to be performed by fit persons of his appointment. So it was with the President in the present case. He was not supposed by anybody to be sent into Louisiana to act personally, in either a civil, military, or judicial character. The spirit and meaning of the bill went no further than to authorize him to employ such men as he should judge capable and worthy of those several kinds of trusts. And so far, Mr. M. said, in the present case, he was entirely willing to delegate the power by law. It would not be permanent, but ad interim only. There was a provision in the section against the perpetuity of this power, by the resumption of it as soon as Congress should have collected information enough to establish a temporary government. And this might in all probability be done during the present session. Mr. M. owned, however, that he should think the bill rather more complete if there was a limitation in it to the amount of expense which would be necessary to carry it into effect, but as he observed a reference in it to the act passed on the 3d of March last, which act contained a limitation as to the sum of money which might be expended, he thought there was no need of moving an amendment for that purpose. As, therefore, there was nothing like a claim of prerogative on the part of the Executive, but on the other hand a Constitutional and sound deposit of powers in him by Congress, Mr. M. hoped the motion to strike out would not prevail.

Mr. GREGG thought the section might be retained, and yet the inconvenience apprehended by the gentleman from Connecticut be obviated by a small amendment, to wit: by adding after the word manner, "not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States." Mr. G. had no fears of the exercise of the powers vested in the President by this bill, or that he would not concur in relinquishing them when Congress may establish a temporary government for the territory. If the gentleman from Connecticut withdrew his motion, he would offer the amendment he had stated.

Mr. DANA said if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania were inserted, it might imply that we may pass laws that were unconstitutional; it was, therefore, superfluous. It is objected to the scope of the second section, that it is unconstitutional; insert the amendment and it nullifies it. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) has referred to a subject with which he is well conversant. He is correct in stating that the formal style of the English acts is in the name of the King. In the formal style of the acts of Parliament, the King is legislator; but will it be inferred from this circumstance that he is the real legislator? The gentleman is too well acquainted with the constitution and laws of that country not to know that the King, though nominally the dispenser of justice, cannot himself sit upon the bench, and that this has been the case since the act of settlement. He might, in support of this position, refer to the declaration of a celebrated Chief Justice of England, who had said that the honor of the Crown had nothing to do with the courts of justice.

The gentleman is equally unfortunate in his remarks on the power of Congress to make rules for the government of a territory. It is objected to this, that in this case you make no laws at all. Is it to make laws, to say a man may do as he pleases? The proposed government is not even provisional or circumscribed. Insufficient also is any argument deducible from the ordinance establishing territorial governments. He presumed the ordinance alluded to was that of 1787. Under that ordinance the President is authorized to appoint the judges of the territory; but once appointed they hold their offices during good behaviour. Who, under that ordinance, make the laws? Neither the judges nor the President. No laws can be accepted but such as have received the sanction of a representative body. What is proposed by the bill? That all powers, military, civil, and judicial, exercised by the officers of the existing government, shall be vested in such persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct. He may, under this authority, establish the whole code of Spanish laws, however contrary to our own; appoint whomsoever he pleases as judges, and remove them according to his pleasure; thus uniting in himself all the power, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. This, though a complete despotism, gentlemen may perhaps say is necessary. If so, let the military power be exercised by the President as Commander-in-Chief of the armies.

OCTOBER, 1803.

The Louisiana Treaty.

H. OF R.

Mr. VARNUM observed, that it seemed to him that gentlemen who had made a Constitutional difficulty respecting the provisions of this bill, and those of the treaty, had, in their arguments, mistaken their ground on the same point; and that they were objecting to the constitutionality of things not within the Constitution. During the previous discussions, as well as on this day, he thought that as to the retention of the free navigation of the Mississippi by Spain and France, the sovereignty of the ceded territory was not completely vested in the United States until the end of twelve years. We acquire the sovereignty over that country under certain terms; we have not at once all of it that relates to trade. There could, therefore, be no unconstitutionality in carrying the treaty into effect on the ground taken by gentlemen.

He considered the objections made to the second section of the bill under consideration of the same nature. We are told that we are about to authorize the exercise of power over the ceded territory not authorized by the Constitution. He would ask if the Constitution were to take effect as soon as the United States take possession of the territory? On this point he would refer to the treaty. It provides that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible." How incorporated? By a Legislative act? No, "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

In what meantime? There is a time when the country is acquired, and a time when it will be admitted into the Union. Between these periods, in the meantime, the people are to enjoy their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. I, said Mr. V., can devise no way of their enjoying these rights, until admitted into the Union, but by their continuing under the government of the laws of Spain. The Senate have made provision for carrying into effect this part of the treaty, and it cannot be carried into effect in any other way. I am, therefore, against striking out the section, and think the amendment unnecessary.

Mr. EPPES said the only question before the Committee was, whether it was important to take possession of this country or not. If a proper view be taken of the proposition of gentlemen opposed to the present measure, though they profess to be the friends of the people of that territory, it will appear in fact to disfranchise them. What will be the effect of striking out the second section of the bill? If the President take possession of the country, what will be the situation of the people? The moment he takes possession, the Spanish government ceases. By what laws then will they be governed? He had never expected from that quarter of the House such a proposition. He had expected from their uniform professions that an attachment to order and good government was with them an universal sentiment. He hoped, therefore, before the Committee concurred with them in striking out the section, some substitute for the government of these people would be offered.

Mr. EVRIST said it was possible the bill under consideration might in its details be objectionable, but in principle it was certainly sound. The Government of the United States has a Constitutional right to acquire territory, and they have consequently a right to take possession of it when acquired. The taking possession of it was not only the right, but the duty of the Government. And how is this to be effected? Will any gentleman venture to propose a delay until Congress shall have passed a new code of laws? Are gentlemen, at this late day, to be informed that this would be to throw away one of the most valuable acquisitions made by our country since the adoption of the Constitution, or the Declaration of Independence? As the gentleman, last speaking, rightly observes, the entire government of Spain ceases on our taking possession. Are we then to abandon the people to anarchy?

As to the extent of the power vested in the Executive, it arises from necessity. This is a new case altogether. There is no doubt that on many particular subordinate points, respecting the secure possession of this country, difficulties may present themselves. But Mr. E. presumed and expected that the same wisdom that acquired it, would preside over the councils of the nation to meet and overcome those difficulties. The second section of the bill contemplates the transfer to officers of the United States, of the same powers now exercised. It may be that the exercise of all these powers will not be necessary; while it is possible that others may be necessary. There may be difficulties of various kinds. He should name none. But as they arise, it will be the duty of the Government to be prepared to meet them.

He would, therefore, wish this act rather to increase than curtail them; and that the President should be authorized not only to continue all necessary existing powers, but to institute such other powers as may be necessary for the well being of the territory. Till when? Until this House and the other branch of the Legislature shall make the necessary laws. The powers delegated by the bill are imposed by the imperious circumstances of the case. What if forcible possession shall prove necessary, and the innocent inhabitants should be slaughtered, through a want of the powers necessary to preserve tranquillity and good order; whose will, under such circumstances, will be the governing one? Will not the President, in such event, have all the powers now given him?

Mr. EUSTIS said he must confess that the objections made to the temporary government of the country, arose from a quarter, which, by opposing every step taken to acquire it, greatly weakened, in his mind, the force of the arguments urged. He recollected when, during the last session, two millions of dollars were proposed to be appropriated towards the acquisition of this important object, it had been objected to, on different grounds—there was then no objection to the constitutionality of the acquisition. He should not, however, go into a detail of the arguments urged on that occasion; those who were present well remembered them. Those objections were well surmounted; and the territory was acquired. After the acquisition, what were the objections of gentlemen? Objections were made that were calculated to weaken our title, and to strengthen that of Spain; and it was further contended that we had no Constitutional right to acquire the territory. These surmounted, what followed? We were then told that we had no right to guaranty to the people the right of citizenship, although the gentleman who urged this difficulty, answered himself in the same breath by saying the Constitution had not provided for such a case. That objection removed, what is the last, and present difficulty? Though called upon to take immediate possession of this territory, you are told, you are not to govern it. This is the amount of the arguments of gentlemen, for if you do not govern it in this way, you can govern it in no other. Mr. E. saw no other alternative; there was no possibility of any other course. He was, therefore, happy to see nothing in the Constitution that forbade pursuing it. On the contrary, it arose imperiously from the acquisition; and the same objections that were now so strenuously insisted upon, would lead to the adoption of those very measures which had been reprobated by both branches of the Legislature, and by a great majority of the American people.

Mr. ELLIOT said as he had the misfortune to differ, on this occasion, from the gentlemen with whom he generally voted, he should take the liberty of stating his objections to the section moved to be stricken out. He was persuaded there would not be imputed to him, for so doing, the least wish to embarrass the accomplishment of the important object of the secure possession of Louisiana.

No; the opinions he entertained were dictated by a wish to accelerate the taking possession. He would endeavor to show that his view of the subject was that taken by the President of the United States. By the law of nations, on the acquisition of country by cession, the laws of the nation ceding continue in force until the laws of the nation acquiring the territory supersede them. What then is necessary to carry this treaty into effect? It is necessary to make the appropriations; this the House have already determined to do. It is necessary to enable the proper authority to take possession of the country. That is done by the first section of this bill. These measures carry the treaty into effect; and the temporary government is immediately consequential.

But it is said, if the President is authorized to take possession, and there shall be no other provision made by Congress, a military government will exist, and will disturb the rights of the people as guarantied by the treaty. No such thing; for the military power will take possession in subordination to the civil authority. To show that the President entertained this view it was only necessary to advert to the language of his Message at the commencement of the session. He therein says: "With the wisdom of Congress it will rest to take those ulterior measures which may be necessary for the immediate occupation, and temporary government of the country."

It is evident that the President considers a temporary government as one of those ulterior measures. In his subsequent Message, he alludes to the same temporary government as an ulterior measure. He says, "the ulterior provisions also suggested in the same communication, for the occupation and government of the country, will call for early attention. Such information relative to its government, as time and distance have permitted me to obtain, will be ready to be laid before you within a few days." This information we have not yet received; and it is but proper that we wait for it.

Mr. E. apprehended no danger from a military government; information will be soon communicated, and in a few days we will be enabled to establish a temporary government on the information we shall have received.

He could not reconcile the second section with the Constitution of the United States; he believed that the Constitution delegated the legislative power to Congress, and not to the President; and that it not only precluded the President from exercising it, but likewise forbade our delegation of it to him. He repeated, what he had before observed, that he had full confidence in the President; but he objected to this delegation of power on principle; he had sworn to support the Constitution, and believing that, under it, Congress, and Congress only had the power of legislation, he must be against delegating it to the President.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD would agree to withdraw his motion for striking out the section, if he thought that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) could have the effect contemplated; but he believed it would not remove his objection, which was, that the powers, stated in the section, could not be delegated in the manner proposed; therefore to say, that when delegated, they shall not be exercised, was saying nothing, or saying that they should not be delegated. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) has not taken his ground with his usual accuracy. He has said that these powers are not transferred to the President, but to the officers appointed by him. True, but how are they to be executed? As the President shall direct; therefore the officers are to be viewed as under subjection to the President, and the powers to be exercised as he shall direct. Virtually then they are to be exercised by the President, and are, in fact, transferred to him; and if we cannot transfer to him the power of legislation and judging in any one territory, we cannot in this, and the act is a violation of the Constitution.

There is another objection to the power reposed in the President by this section. The Constitution provides that "he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein provided for, and which shall be established by law: but the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Department." Now, by the section of the bill under consideration, power is given to the President to appoint all the officers in the province, from the governor down to the lowest officer. Gentlemen will not say that the office of governor or judge is one of the inferior offices contemplated in the Constitution. They had never been so considered. In all the arrangements of appointments for the territorial governments, the sanction of the Senate had been required for the governors, judges, secretaries, &c.; whereas, in this instance, the President is clothed with power to appoint all the officers in the territory. He apprehended that such a power could not be constitutionally given.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he had no wish to retard the enactment of the necessary laws for taking possession, which ought to be immediately done; and he expected, if this section were stricken out, the wisdom of Congress would devise a proper provision.

A gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) not content with the extensive delegation of power made by this bill, is for giving to the President all power; the effect of which would be, not only to make him King, but Grand Inquisitor likewise.

Mr. EUSTIS explained, and said that he was for giving all powers necessary for the welfare of the territory.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—The powers proposed to be conferred by the gentleman are without limits. It may be necessary for the welfare of the people, to secure their religion. The President may be therefore, constituted grand inquisitor, he may also be made a king, and likewise a judge, for the good of the people. I am not, said Mr. G., willing myself to give him such extensive powers. I can, however, well account for certain gentlemen urging on this occasion the old French argument of "imperious necessity." But such a pretext can never justify me in giving a vote that will violate the Constitution. I can, in truth, see no such necessity, as provision can be made for admitting these people to the enjoyment of all the privileges stipulated by the treaty, without involving a violation of the Constitution. Gentlemen may criminate, as they please, the motives of those who are for restraining this extension of Executive power; but I trust, whatever may be the feelings of gentlemen, that the Committee will not be impressed with the same opinion entertained by them; but that if they consider this delegation of power as repugnant to the Constitution, they will not agree to it, or, in other words, to the investiture of the President with absolute power over this province. If, on the other hand, they think the delegation is Constitutional, they will feel no repugnance to agreeing to it; because, as I observed before, the power will be of short duration, and will not, probably, be abused.

As to the idea of some gentlemen, that this territory, not being a part of the United States, but a colony, and that therefore we may do as we please with it, it is not correct. If we acquire a colony by conquest or purchase—and I believe we may do both—it is not consistent with the Constitution to delegate to the President, even over a colony thus acquired, all power, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial; for this would make him the despot of the colony. Mr. G. concluded his remarks by observing that he had no jealousy of the abuse of this power by the President; but not being, in his opinion, authorized by the Constitution he could not agree to vote for it.

Mr. JACKSON considered the second section of the bill as repugnant to the Constitution; but if this were not the case, he had other objections to it. He thought it important to take immediate possession of the country, and was deeply interested as the representative of constituents who lived on the waters connected with the Mississippi; still he did not think it proper to be premature in establishing a system of government. So far as relates to the taking possession, said Mr. J., let us then adopt immediately the necessary measures. But so far as relates to the formation of a government, let us take time for it. I would prefer an interregnum to doing anything which should militate against the Constitution, or principles that have been long respected. I wish not to adopt the principle of the right of this House to delegate such extensive powers for even one day; for if they possess the right of delegating them for one day, they possess the co-extensive right of delegating them forever. Let us not then delegate them at all. It is my wish to be consistent. I have always been against delegating extensive power to the Executive; and I know not of any power so extensive before delegated. But gentlemen say it is incumbent on us to take immediate possession. For this the first section of the bill is amply sufficient; and I cannot see the inconvenience of postponing the other part of the bill for a few days; particularly if the ideas of the gentlemen from Vermont (Mr. ELLIOT) are correct, that the laws of the ceding country will remain in force until superseded by those of the country that has acquired the territory. The gentleman from New York sees no danger in giving to the President despotic power over this territory for a few days.

Mr. MITCHELL explained, and observed that the gentleman had mistaken his remark. His object was to show, that though the power might appear to be despotic, yet that it really was not so.

Mr. JACKSON said he understood the gentleman as he had explained. If the power delegated carried with it such an appearance, it ought to be a sufficient reason for rejecting it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. VARNUM) has observed that we do not acquire the exclusive sovereignty of this territory till the expiration of twelve years after the ratification of the treaty. In this opinion I differ from him, for if we do not possess the exclusive sovereignty, it would be impossible for us to legislate, as the act of legislation is the highest attribute of sovereignty.

When I recur to the Constitution, I find that though it does not expressly say, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers shall be distinct, as some constitutions lately formed do, yet it amounts in fact to the same thing, by delegating special powers exclusively to particular departments. I believe also the President to be inimical to the extension of Executive power. I am not afraid of delegating such power, if not inconsistent with the Constitution, because I have so much confidence in the President, as to be convinced that he would not abuse it. But I believe principle ought, under all circumstances, to be respected; and under present circumstances, though we may have a President so congenial to our wishes. What, if hereafter we should deem it important to oppose the delegation of such power? gentlemen, in favor of such a delegation will say, here is a precedent set by yourselves, and thus preclude us, on the score of consistency, from opposing the measure.

I did intend to say something about the right of the United States to acquire territory; but the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) having acknowledged the right to acquire it, either by purchase or cession, renders all further remarks on this point unnecessary.

Mr. SMILIE said, this subject struck him differently from other gentlemen. If it appeared clear to him that the Constitutional right to delegate the powers contemplated by the second section did not exist, he should vote against it. But he entertained no doubt on this point. He knew that it had been doubted whether the Constitution authorized the Government of the United States to acquire territory; but those doubts were this day abandoned. He agreed in opinion with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. VARNUM,) that the Constitution of the United States did not extend to this territory any farther than they were bound by the compact between the ceding power and the people. On this principle they had a right, viewing it in the light of a colony, to give it such government as the Government of the United States might think proper, without thereby violating the Constitution; when incorporated into the Union, the inhabitants must enjoy all the rights of citizens. He would thank gentlemen to show any part of the Constitution that extends either Legislative, Executive, or Judicial power, over this territory. If none such could be shown, it must rest with the discretion of the Government to give it such a system as they may think best for it. At the same time, Mr. S. said, he would pledge himself to be among the first to incorporate the territory in the Union, and to admit the people to all the rights of citizens of the United States.

Mr. RODNEY.—When a Constitutional question is made, and Constitutional objections urged, by a respectable member of this House, they shall always receive from me a respectful attention. On this occasion I shall endeavor to answer the objections, and remove the doubts entertained by some gentlemen. I believe we shall find that, by adopting the second section of the bill under consideration, we shall not infringe the Constitution in the remotest degree. No person is more opposed to the extreme of absolute and unlimited power, or to vesting in any man that authority which, by not being circumscribed within known bounds, may be easily abused. No man can be more opposed to the exercise by the President of powers exercised by the Spanish inquisition, and authorized by other Governments. But cases may occur where, for a moment, powers to which, without an absolute necessity, no one would agree, become necessary to be vested in some department of the Government; and I am in favor of this section for the reasons assigned by my friend from Virginia, to wit, that the exercise of the powers delegated will be confined to a short space, and will be of no further duration than shall be necessary to obtain the end of a secure possession of the territory. It is admitted by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) and he deserves infinite honor for the admission, which shows that he has magnanimity to acknowledge an error when he discovers it, that the United States have a right to acquire territory by treaty or purchase. The other day the gentleman admitted the right to acquire territory by warlike means; to-day he goes a step further, and admits that which enables me to demonstrate that this section involves no violation of the Constitution.

Mr. GRISWOLD explained.—He wished, once for all, to state what he had stated on a previous occasion, and what he had stated that day. He did admit that the United States might acquire territory by war or purchase; and he had always admitted this. But he had said that they could not by treaty admit a foreign country and incorporate it into the Union. If the gentleman from Delaware considers these remarks as inconsistent, he is welcome to the opinion.

Mr. RODNEY.—I thank the gentleman from Connecticut for his explanation. The observations I was about to make were on no other ground than that now stated by the gentleman. The United States, it is acknowledged, have a right to extend their territory beyond that which they possessed when the Constitution was formed. If, then, there exist the right to acquire territory, there is a consequence of the laws that pervade all civilized nations, which will show not only the constitutionality but the propriety also of this section. It is a received principle of the law of nations, that, when territory is ceded, the people who inhabit it have a right to the laws they formerly lived under, embracing the whole civil and criminal code, until they are altered or amended by the country to whom the cession is made. This is the received principle of the law of nations, and operates wherever the right to acquire territory is previously given. I will put a plain case, on the ground so commonly of late resorted to, that of acquiring territory by war. The right to make war is vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. Suppose we had gone down the Mississippi, and favored the wishes of some of our citizens. Would not gentlemen, in that case, have acknowledged that we should have possessed the right of laying contributions? Should we not have had the right of saying to those who exercised the powers of government in that country, "Begone! We will make new arrangements; the powers of government shall be exercised by such particular organs as we like. Your laws and your religion shall be preserved; but your officers shall be replaced by ours." Under the laws of nations we should have enjoyed all these powers.

But, independent of this power conferred by the law of nations, I am inclined to think the provisions of the Constitution apply to this case. There is a wide distinction between States and Territories, and the Constitution appears clearly to indicate it. By examining the Constitution accurately, it will be found that the provision relied upon by the gentleman from Connecticut will not avail to support his argument. It will appear that it is to operate in the case of States only. By the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, it is declared that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or any particular State."

This provision does not limit or restrain the authority of Congress with respect to Territories, but vests them with full and complete power to exercise a sound discretion generally on the subject. Let us not be told this power, from its greatness, is liable to abuse. If arguments are drawn from the abuse against the use of power, I know no power which may not be abused, and it will follow that the same arguments that are urged against the use of this power may be urged against the use of all power. If the Constitutional powers given to Congress are abused by their Representatives, the people may dismiss them. But on this subject I apprehend there is little danger of abuse by Representatives coming from States. If I am correct in this construction of the Constitution, it puts an end to the Constitutional objections urged by gentlemen. They may oppose the present measure as inexpedient; but when we contemplate the people on whom it is to operate, we may rest satisfied that they will consider it as beneficial, inasmuch as it does not produce a violent change in their habits and laws.

We may be told that, in the government of the Northwestern Territory, there are certain fixed rules established. But by a recurrence to the ordinance for the government of that Territory, and to the laws of Congress subsequently made, it will be seen that Congress have conceived themselves to be possessed of the right, and have actually exercised the power, to alter the Territory, by adding to or taking from it as they thought proper, and by making rules variant from those under which it was originally organized.

In the Territories of the United States, under the ordinances of Congress, the Governor and the Judges have a right to make laws. Could this be done in a State? I presume not. It shows that Congress have a power in the Territories, which they cannot exercise in States; and that the limitations of power, found in the Constitution, are applicable to States and not to Territories.

The question was then put on striking out the second section, and lost—ayes 30.

Mr. DANA asked if this army, to be raised for the purpose of taking possession of this territory, was intended to march out of the United States?

Mr. J. RANDOLPH asked, whether Gen. Wayne, with his army, did not go out of the United States? An act authorized them to go out of the United States.

Mr. SANFORD asked, whether there was not a law passed last session for marching troops out of the United States to New Orleans? He said he was not then a member of the House, and could not correctly ascertain the fact.

Mr. DANA.—No power was given to the President to march an army to New Orleans, though a vote might have passed to raise eighty thousand men; but I maintain that they could not be compelled to go out of the United States.

Mr. SANFORD understood these eighty thousand men were intended to take possession of New Orleans by force.

Mr. G. GRISWOLD.—I want to know when they were voted for to march to New Orleans. I cannot recollect such a circumstance. I was in favor of vigorous measures, but I know of no such law that passed for their going to New Orleans.

The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to amend the second section, by adding to the end thereof the following words: "for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the full enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion."

Agreed to without a division.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Amendment to the Constitution.

OCTOBER, 1803.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,
Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to permanent arrangements for the government of Louisiana, be referred to a select committee.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RHEA, Mr. HOGE, Mr. G. GRISWOLD, and Mr. BEDINGER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

FRIDAY, October 28.

A petition of William Pancoast, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that a patent may be granted to him for a quantity of vacant land in this District, a warrant of survey for which was obtained by the petitioner from the land office of the State of Maryland, and placed in the hands of the Surveyor of Prince George's county, in the said State, who refused to execute the same previous to the period when Congress assumed the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. LEIB, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. PLATER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a report made to him of the opinion of the persons employed to take a survey of the harbor in the island of Nantucket, and of the bar and shoals near the same, as to the measures necessary to secure a sufficient channel for loaded ships destined for that port; together with an estimate of the probable expenses, and a chart of the said harbor and shoals, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the sixteenth of February last; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. RODNEY submitted a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States against several States for balances of debt.

Mr. THOMAS moved to take the resolution into immediate consideration. Carried—ayes 43, noes 42.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved its reference to a Committee of the Whole. Agreed to ayes 53, noes 34; and it was made the order for Monday next.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

An engrossed resolution for the amendment of the Constitution was read a third time, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the different States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, viz:

"In all future elections of President and Vice President, the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President; of whom, one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The person voted for as President having a majority of the votes of all the Electors appointed shall be the President; and if no person have such majority, then, from the five highest on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose the President, in the manner directed by the Constitution.

"The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President; and in case of an equal number of votes for two or more persons for Vice President, they being the highest on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President from those having such equal number, in the manner directed by the Constitution."

Mr. G. GRISWOLD.—I rise to assign the reasons for the vote which I shall give against the resolution now under consideration. When in Committee of the whole House on the same resolution, it was with much satisfaction that I heard gentlemen who advocated the resolution declare their anxious desire and full determination not to make any inroad upon the article of the Constitution, now under consideration, so as in any degree to impair the rights and benefits thereby secured to the smaller States.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) acknowledged his very great respect for the worthies who formed the Constitution—that our Union was a Confederation of States; and the result of a compromise between the several different States, as States, and that he was the last man who would consent to take from the smaller States any right or advantage secured to them by this article of the Constitution.

Should I be able to show that the alteration now proposed would materially affect the interest of the smaller States in the choice of President of the United States, I trust that gentlemen, agreeably to their public declarations, will vote with me against the resolution.

The Constitution of the United States is a compact formed by the several States to and for the general good. It is well known to have been produced by a spirit of compromise among the several States; that much difficulty arose in its formation; and, perhaps, in no one article of the Constitution, could there have arisen greater jealousies between the larger and smaller States than that pointing out the mode of electing the Chief Magistrate. The larger States, as is natural to suppose, would contend for an election, according to the number of inhabitants of each State, as they thereby would secure more votes; the smaller States, on the principle that it was a confederation of States, would contend for an equal vote; that is, to vote by States, and not by population or numbers. To settle the difficulty, the present article was agreed to, and thereby both of the above principles, as contended for, by the larger and smaller States, adopted to a certain extent—the mode being a mixture of both principles. First, it permits the election of President to be by numbers; that is, giving each State votes in proportion to its population; whereby the larger States, considered in their corporate capacity as States, have the advantage of the smaller States in their corporate capacity as States. But in case of a failure of choice in the first mode, then the second, of choosing by States, is to be pursued, whereby the former States have an equal vote with the larger States.

In no other place than on this floor are the smaller States on an equal footing with the larger States in the choice of the President of the United States. It follows then, of course, that the greater the chance of bringing the States to a vote on this floor, the more advantageous it is to the smaller States, as here the smaller States are as powerful as the larger States. By the Constitution, as it now stands, there are two chances for a choice of President on this floor: 1st, when there are more persons than one who have a Constitutional majority of votes and are equal in number; 2d, when there is no person who has a Constitutional majority. Only one of the above cases can happen at a time; but there is always a chance for one of the two to happen. But, by the proposed amendment, the first before-mentioned chance can never happen; it is wholly taken away, and only one possible chance of voting on this floor by States left. For, when your ballots designate who is voted for as President, it never can happen that more persons than one can have a Constitutional majority of votes. One chance then of voting on this floor by States being taken away by the proposed amendment, it follows irresistibly that the smaller States will be injured, and the larger States benefitted. I ask then, sir, if gentlemen representing the larger States can be sincere, when they declare that they mean not to infringe upon the rights of the smaller States, as secured by this article of the Constitution, and still give their vote for the present resolution? The one in my opinion will contradict the other.

I have the honor of representing one of the larger States, but I feel no wish to lessen the rights of the smaller States, as secured by this article of the Constitution, and I trust my vote will correspond with my declaration.

I also ask, sir, if gentlemen who represent some of the smaller States are willing to give up so important a right as is secured them by this article of the Constitution? Gentlemen may think they are answering the wishes of their constituents, but I am sure if their constituents fully understood the principles of this article of the Constitution, they never would thank the gentlemen for their votes in favor of the resolution.

I well know, sir, that at first view it appears plausible that the ballots should designate who is voted for as President. I also confess, sir, that when the subject was first mentioned to me, I could see no solid objection why it should not be. But, sir, when I examine the nature of our Government, the clashing interests of the several States, the balance of power and influence necessary to be formed between the larger and smaller States, and trace all the minute ways and means by which this power and influence may operate, I find many objections. The more this article of the Constitution is investigated, the more will its principles be admired.

The present mode of bringing forward candidates for the office of President and Vice President is the least liable to call forth art, intrigue, and corruption; the uncertainty of the event and the difficulty of making arrangements are strong checks to the artful and designing. But the moment the mode pointed out by this resolution is adopted, the door for intrigue and corruption is open; the candidates and their friends can calculate with certainty and apply the means direct; the power of party, influence of office, art, cunning, intrigue, and corruption, will all be used, and used to effect, because the object is certain.

I would ask, sir, if this is a proper time to alter the Constitution? The public mind is agitated with violent party rage. Cool, calm reasoning is not to be expected. The general good must and will yield to party purposes, because parties will consider that to be for public good, which immediately promotes their own views. In such a state of things, I think an attempt to alter the Constitution not advisable. Again, sir, I believe it is better to suffer a small inconvenience, should any exist, than to attempt an alteration; for the habit of compliance on the part of the people with a rule of Government, is of as much importance to give effect to that rule, as the soundness of the principle contained in the rule itself. By altering the articles of the Constitution for every trivial pretext, you destroy that sacred regard which every citizen ought to have for the Constitution. For these reasons I shall assuredly vote against the resolution.

Mr. HUGER—Much as has been said, Mr. Speaker, and much of our time as has been already taken up, since the commencement of the present session, in discussing the resolution now under consideration, you will no doubt have remarked, that the debate has heretofore been almost exclusively carried on by gentlemen of one particular side of the House; neither will it have escaped your observation, that numerous as have been the speakers, and various and lengthy as have been their arguments, scarcely one of them has deemed it necessary to discuss the general merits of the question, or to show the propriety of making the proposed alteration in our national compact. The necessity, propriety, and expediency of making such an alteration, would seem, indeed, to have been regarded as points conceded on all hands, as constituting a proposition, so plain, so self-evident, so unencumbered with anything like a doubt, that it would have been superfluous to bestow a moment's thought on, or to adduce a single argument in support of it. The gentlemen, therefore, who have preceded me, taking it for granted that an alteration must, and would of course, be made, have confined themselves almost exclusively to the consideration of the manner in which it was to be brought about, and the extent to which it was at this time to be carried. I have listened with the utmost attention for several days past to the various propositions which they have presented to the consideration of the House. I have been greatly edified by their arguments and have admired the ingenuity and ability with which the respective propositions have been supported. You will permit me to add, sir, that I have heard with infinite pleasure, the declarations and assurances of attachment to our present happy Constitution, which have been so frequently expressed by almost every gentleman who has taken any part in the debate. It has given me peculiar satisfaction to hear these sentiments repeated again and again, by characters no less respectable for their talents, than distinguished for their influence in the community. The fears and apprehensions which, I will candidly acknowledge, had made a deep and painful impression on my mind, have been greatly lessened, in some degree removed, by the assurances of unfeigned acquiescence in, and perfect contentment with the present Constitution of the United States, and by the expressions of unequivocal disapprobation of every other alteration in the national compact, (save the one now proposed,) which have fallen from quarters, from whence, I will not deny, that I had anticipated and apprehended sentiments of a very contrary tendency. But whilst I give full and perfect credit, Mr. Speaker, to the assertions of honorable gentlemen; whilst I rejoice most sincerely that the members of this respectable body one and all accord, and unite in one common attachment to that compact which forms the bond of our Union; whilst I deprecate the idea of casting anything like an imputation on the motives of any member on this floor, I cannot but lament that an exception is made in one instance, and that the Constitution is not allowed to remain unaltered and as it now stands. I impute not, I repeat it, any improper motives to the friends of the resolution at present under consideration. The rage, however, for change and innovation has, of late years, spread itself with a rapidity unequalled among the nations of the earth; and we have seen and heard enough out of doors and in our own country, to authorize caution, and to excite the apprehension that there are many among us to whom great and material alterations in our national compact would be more than acceptable. Obsta principis is an old and trite, but, on most occasions, a sound and safe maxim. In times like the present, I deem it our only safeguard—the sheet-anchor of our political salvation. This nation has experienced too immediate, and too fortunate a change in its political situation and prospects, since the adoption of the present Constitution; we have increased too rapidly in wealth, in strength, and in national prosperity, and we enjoy too great a portion of present happiness under its benign auspices to assent easily, and at a moment's warning, to many great and evidently serious alterations in it. The most enthusiastic advocate of innovations would not venture to propose such; for it is evident the public mind is not yet sufficiently prepared to receive them. It is only by degrees, and by undermining under plausible prettexts, and at favorable moments, first one, and then another of the main supports of the fabric, that we shall be exposed to see it, sooner or later, begin to totter, then crumble, and I fear bury us in its ruins.

Here, then, on the merits of the Constitution, as it was presented to us by the Convention, as it now is, I take my stand. Upon this ground I am unequivocally opposed to the alteration proposed, for I feel the strongest conviction that, if it obtains, we shall have given a deadly wound to the national compact, we shall have effaced one of its leading features, we shall have signed the death warrant of one of the vital and most important principles upon which it was originally established.

I have already observed, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen who preceded me in the present debate have avoided everything like a discussion of the general merits of the question, and confined themselves almost exclusively to the consideration of the manner in which the proposed alteration is to be brought about, and the extent to which it is at this time to be carried.

Some observations have, nevertheless, fallen from two gentlemen, both of them from the very respectable State of Virginia, which appear to me peculiarly worthy of attention. The one (Mr. CLORTON) has presented to us a view of the subject, which, although I by no means think the correct one, is evidently that in which most of the gentlemen in this House have regarded it, and in which persons out of doors are for the most part wont to consider this, and indeed every other Constitutional question. I have listened to him however with great pleasure, and from the ingenuity and information which pervaded such of his arguments as I could fully comprehend, I feel much regret that the utmost attention on my part, owing partly to the feebleness of his voice, and partly to the unfavorable situation of his seat, did not enable me always to connect his ideas and arguments, and perfectly to understand him. This gentleman seems, for the moment, to have forgotten that the Government under which we live is formed upon Federative no less than upon Republican principles; and though wishing to introduce an important alteration in our national compact, puts the compact itself, the spirit with which it was formed, and the vital principles upon which it was established, entirely out of the question. He takes an abstract view of the subject, as if it had no connexion whatever with other parts and principles of the compact, carries us back to a state of nature, and seems to regard it as a radical error in the Constitution that the provisions and modifications it contains are not solely founded upon the broad basis of population and numbers. He talks to us of the rights of man in a state of nature, of the origin of the social compact, of the foundation upon which all Governments ought to be formed, viz: the will of the people; and, drawing his inference from these pure, unmixed, and abstract principles and theories, thinks, whilst he shows us what would be the most eligible mode of providing for the Executive branch of Government about to be formed for the protection of the people, just rising for the first time into political existence, he proves triumphantly and unanswerably that such too ought to be the mode adopted by a Union like ours, composed of so many distinct and independent sovereignties, of so old a date, and having such various, distinct, and complicated views and interests. Let me not, however, be misunderstood; I am not finding fault with, or condemning in the abstract, the principles laid down by the honorable member. Still less would I be understood to deny that the Constitution has been formed upon the broad basis of the public good, and the will of the people of the respective States. I well know, and it is for that very reason I feel so sincere an attachment to it, that the Federal compact is founded upon liberal and genuine republican principles; but let not gentlemen in the meantime forget that the Government under which we live is of a federative nature; and that these general, unmixed, and abstract principles, upon which we are called on exclusively to act, were then modified and, practically applied to the wants, prejudices, and clashing interests of a numerous and increasing population, divided into a number of distinct sovereignties, spread over a vast extent of country by that very compact in which it is now proposed to make so material and essential an alteration. This is the true point of view in which the subject should be taken up; and I am happy in finding the ideas of the gentleman's colleague, to whom I before alluded, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH,) accord so perfectly with my own in the present instance, and that he too is of opinion, that this is the true and proper point of view in which not only the present but every other proposition to alter or amend the Federal compact, should invariably be considered. Sir, I am truly happy to recollect that the sentiments of that gentleman and my own accord so perfectly on this part of the subject, for, exclusively of the advantages which the weight of his authority must afford to my argument, I am free to acknowledge that it has frequently been a source of regret to me to find a difference in our view of things led me on so many occasions to differ in opinion with most of the companions of my youth whom I have met on this floor, and whom I have for so many years been in the habit of regarding as persons of honor and worth.

It was stated, and in my humble opinion correctly stated, by the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) of whom I have last spoken, some days since, that, when we were about to make any alteration in the compact which unites these States together, it behooved us not to take into view merely what we thought, individually, it ought to have been, or wished it to be, nor what shape, were we in convention for that purpose, we should give it; but rather to consider what shape had already been given to it, and what the compact, as it presents itself to us in the Constitution, now is. Taking up the subject then under this point of view, allow me, sir, to put these questions to the House. Let me ask, what is the Constitution of the United States? From what sources did it originate? In what manner, by whom, from what causes, upon what principles, in what spirit, was it originally adopted? Is it not a federative Government, agreed upon between thirteen distinct and separate sovereignties, for their mutual defence and protection?

Is it not, in its essence, a compact, a bargain, a perfect compromise of the interests, powers, influence, and rights of a number of independent societies, who have united for their common advantage, and who are no further bound or pledged to each other than by the articles and conditions in the written contract—the Constitution—which has been acceded to by them all? And is it not upon the spirit, in which the conditions of that compact was originally formed, that every amendment to, or alteration in it, should be predicated? These questions must all be necessarily answered in the affirmative. The inhabitants of these United States did not then, in forming the Federal Constitution, act in mass as one people, nor can the abstract principles borrowed from different authors on the primeval formation of political societies apply to them. The worn-out theory of a number of insulated beings assembled together in an extensive plain, and led by their common wants and necessities to form themselves into a body politic, cannot be applied to the Federal Government, nor can inferences drawn from notions of this kind afford correct grounds upon which to build or support alterations and amendments in the national compact.

Thirteen Colonies, at this time composing the United States, spread over an extensive continent, having been threatened with a privation of their rights and liberties, were induced to form a league, offensive and defensive, and to unite for their mutual and common defence. After a bloody though not inglorious contest, they severed themselves forever from the mother country, and they became and were acknowledged as thirteen independent and distinct Republics or Sovereignties. Under what gloomy and critical circumstances they found themselves for some few years after the close of the war, it would be superfluous for me to detail to this House. Let it suffice to say, that their situation was such as seriously to alarm all classes of our citizens, and to threaten complete anarchy, perhaps political dissolution, unless some bond of union, better adapted to their wants and necessities than the original Confederacy, could be established. That band of worthies therefore, as they have been aptly styled, were sent from twelve, I believe, of the States, who, having met together in convention, ultimately formed that compact, which, having been since ratified by all the States, now happily unites us in one great Union. But by whom and by what authority were the members of the Convention delegated? Whom did they represent when assembled together? They were not, it must be acknowledged, even in the degree that the members of this House are, the immediate representatives of the people, inhabiting that part of this vast continent in which the United States are comprised. They were not selected by the people at large, nor did they represent them in their original and individual capacities. No, sir, they were sent to represent the interests and views of thirteen distinct sovereignties; they were appointed by the governments of the different States, and they held their authority from the States, as

States, and not from the people of the United States generally and indiscriminately. When met therefore, in convention, their object was not to form one general consolidated government for the inhabitants scattered over this vast territory, but to modify still further, and to draw still closer the bands of alliance, by which these States were already connected. And it cannot surely be forgotten, that one of the strongest objections, one of those most insisted on against the Constitution, was, that federative principles had not been sufficiently retained, or rather that they had been totally abandoned, and the Constitution approached too nearly to a consolidation of the different members of the Confederacy, and one general national Government. It is not necessary for me here to detail the difficulties, which opposed themselves to the formation and adoption of any compact, more efficient than that of the old Confederacy, nor would the opportunities I have had of knowing them, (for I was not only under age, but absent from America, when the Convention met) enable me to do justice to the subject. Every one knows, however, that difficulties without number did present themselves, and the Convention was more than once on the eve of dissolving itself without agreeing upon anything. It is a fact equally well ascertained, that the great bone of contention, the point of all others which it was most difficult to adjust, was the jarring interests and opposite pretensions of the large and small States. This was the point upon which the whole business turned, and gentlemen will see at once the justice of the remark, when they recollect that although every other amendment whatever, after the year eighteen hundred and eight, may be made to the Constitution, by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, yet a single exception is made, and it is particularly specified, that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Why then this single exception, but because the interest and opposite pretensions of the large and small States were the great bone of contention, and the equal suffrage in the Senate the great, the essential compromise between these conflicting interests and pretensions. But this, though the most important, the sine qua non of any compromise, was by no means the only compromise which took place between them.

The great outlines of the Constitution were, I presume, Mr. Speaker, agreed on without much difficulty, and pretty generally acquiesced in. It was understood on all hands that the Government should be formed on republican principles—that the great departments of which it must necessarily consist should be distinct, and, as far as possible, independent of each other. The difficulty was in the detail, and more especially in respect to the quantum of State sovereignty which was to be yielded to the Union, and the degree of influence which was to be respectively given up or retained by the large and small States. Both were at that time independent of each other, and perfectly equal in their rights and sovereign powers, though very unequal in size, strength, wealth, and population. The basis of a republican government, however, is no doubt the will of the people; and that will could only be expressed and brought into action in a country so extensive as ours, by representation and elections. How then was that representation to be apportioned and those elections organized? To adopt the most common and simple principle in the abstract, and allow the representation to depend entirely on numbers, and the elections to be made indiscriminately and without modification by the people at large, would have been to put an end at once and at one blow to all State sovereignty, to amalgamate the inhabitants of thirteen free and independent Republics into one common mass, and to place the smaller and more feeble completely and forever at the mercy of the more powerful and larger States. But was this done? was such a result desirable? would the States at that day have acquiesced in any similar arrangement? Most certainly not; and, consequently, a totally different modification and compromise took place. The Legislative department of the Government was divided into two distinct branches—a Senate and House of Representatives. In the latter, it is true, the principle of numbers and population was, to a certain degree, adopted, yet still under very important modifications, and with evident deviation from the abstract principle. In the first place, a certain class of people, who unfortunately existed in one portion of the Union, though not allowed any immediate interest themselves in the Government, and regarded rather as property than as beings entitled to any civil or political rights, were included at a certain ratio in the calculation of the number of Representatives who were to have a seat in this House. This difficult and knotty point happily settled, it was in the second place determined that the members of this body, though understood to be the immediate representatives of the people, should not be elected by the people of the United States at large, as one people; but its share of the whole representation according to the ratio and in conformity to the compromise above specified, was apportioned to each respective State, and is to be exclusively elected by the people of that State. Notwithstanding every modification, however, which could be devised, it was evident, and perfectly understood, that although the smaller States would have a voice and proportionate vote, yet the interest and the will of the larger must virtually prevail in the House of Representatives, and that they would in fact dispose of this body at their will. As a partial check, therefore, as some little safeguard against this overweening power on their part, the federative principle was completely retained in its utmost purity, and without the smallest modification, in the other branch of Legislature, the Senate; and not only an equal vote and representation is given to all the States, however large, or however small, but the members who compose the Senate are not even to be elected by the people of the several States, but are to be chosen by, and immediately to represent, the government of each individual State. The difficulties which presented themselves in organizing the Legislative department of the Government, being thus surmounted and compromised, another question no less embarrassing and difficult to solve, arose, viz: in what manner the Executive powers ought to be disposed of.

Before I proceed to investigate this part of the Constitution, it may not be amiss, Mr. Speaker, to observe that in the formation of any political association upon free principles, it has ever been deemed the Gordian knot, the great desideratum, to find out and to ascertain the best mode of disposing of and organizing the Executive branch of the Government; nor is the experiment which these States are now (I trust successfully) making of the practicability of uniting so vast a territory as is comprised in the American Confederacy, under one general and national government, (founded on free and republican principles,) more interesting or important to the interests of mankind, in any one point of view, than as relates to the creation and disposal of the Executive power.

The history and experience of past ages show us indeed the rocks and quicksands, among which our bark may be stranded and wrecked; but we are still left without a chart or compass, by the assistance of which we might be enabled to avail ourselves of the mistakes and misfortunes of those who have gone before us, and steer our course in safety and security. Divide the Executive power and place it in the hands of many, and you so distract, weaken, and enfeeble it, that it becomes unequal to its end: the security and protection of the body politic. Hence it seems to be the received maxim, that this branch of the Government should be as compact and as concentrated, as a due respect to existing circumstances may permit. A serious difficulty, nevertheless, remains yet to be gotten over, in relation to the mode and manner in which it is to be created and brought into action. The first impulse of our feelings and common sense, untaught by experience and waiving local objections, would seem no doubt to point out at once the mode of election: yet such have been the inconveniences, such the fatal and bloody effects of creating the Executive branch in this way, that we have found not only in monarchical, but in some even of those governments deemed most free, an hereditary has been thought preferable to an elective Executive.

The members of the Convention, however, were too well acquainted with the feelings and sentiments of the American people to hesitate long on this point, and it was consequently determined that the Executive powers should be lodged in the hands of a single individual, under the title of President, who should hold his office during the term of four years, at the end of which period a new election should take place. But the real difficulty in the organization of this department under our Constitution now naturally suggests itself to the mind, viz: how, and by whom, this President was to be elected; for it must be obvious, that all these jealousies and conflicting views and interests of the large and small States, which had been happily compromised, as relates to the Legislative authority, would, of course, apply with increased force in the case of the Executive. To divide this branch, as had been done in the former instance, would be, as I have already shown, to enfeeble it, to deprive it of all energy, to render it insufficient and entirely unequal to the purposes for which it was intended. If the Executive power, on the other hand, was to be vested in a single person, and he elected by the people of the United States, or even on the modified principles upon which the members of the House of Representatives were to be elected, it followed, of necessity, that the larger States would elect whom they pleased, and consequently, the Executive branch of the Government would be entirely under their control and the champion and promoter of their views and interests. But the large States have an entire control over one of the two Houses, of which the National Legislature is composed, and an equality of votes (with all the advantages accruing from superior strength and power, and consequently superior influence) in the other. If, then, in addition to all this, the election of the Executive is put in their hands, you add strength to the strong, grant more power to those already too powerful, and yield up virtually to the large States that branch of the Government, which not only was to have a partial veto on the proceedings of the Legislature, but would probably give impulse to the whole, and be always on the watch and ever ready to avail itself of such favorable occurrences and favorable moments as might best enable them to carry their projects of aggrandizement and encroachment on their more feeble associates, into execution. On the other hand, the larger States, to whom fortune and the nature of the case necessarily gave a preponderating influence in this instance, could scarcely be expected to make a sacrifice of this advantage to the jealousies and fears of the small and weaker, and suffer them, as a thing of course, to take possession of the Executive branch of the Government. In this dilemma, what was done by the Convention?

As usual a compromise took place, and as nearly as possible upon the same principles upon which every other provision of the Constitution is predicated. It was decided that the Executive power should rest in a single individual. It was agreed that he should be elected, not by the people at large, not by the people of each State in the first instance; but by a number of Electors (equal to the combined representation of the States in the Senate, and that of the people of the several States in the House of Representatives) elected by the people of the several States, in the proportion to which they might be respectively entitled, according to the complicated ratio which had been adopted. This modified and complicated mode of election notwithstanding, it was evident the election of the President would be in the hands of the larger States. Every additional security therefore was sought for, the ingenuity of the Convention was put to the rack to invent and devise some further means of quieting the fears and apprehensions of the smaller States, affording them every safeguard, and putting in their hands every check which the nature of the case would admit of, against the preponderating influence of the interest opposed to them; and I have ever understood, I have ever been taught to believe, by those few of the original framers of the Constitution with whom I have had the happiness to be acquainted, or to converse on the subject, that this very provision which obliges the Electors in each State to vote indiscriminately for two persons to fill the offices of President and Vice President, and which it is now proposed to do away, was regarded as the best, the most effectual means, and that which did in fact tend most to sooth and quiet the fears of the smaller States, and was in this view, and for this very purpose, adopted as a part of the Constitution. The more I turn the subject over in my mind, indeed, the more closely I endeavor to examine and investigate it, the more confirmed are my impressions and convictions, that this really was the case; that the proposition to alter or amend the Constitution in the manner proposed, is neither more nor less than a State question; a question between the different States of the Union, regarded in their original capacity as sovereign and independent States; a question which involves in it the vital principle upon which the Federal compact was formed, viz: a compromise between the fears and jealousies, the jarring interests, and pretensions of the large and small States. I feel myself I confess, sir, unequal to this part of the subject. I am sensible of my inability to calculate all the chances of influence and consequent protection which this, in my humble opinion, little understood provision, affords to the small States, or to point out the various modes in which it was anticipated, that it might and would, in various instances and on various occasions, operate in their favor. Waiving, however, one happy and material effect which I think it must have in regard to the Union at large, viz: that it tends to create a moral necessity on the part of the Electors to bring forward the most eminent characters, as well to fill the office of Vice President as that of President, waiving this certainly not unimportant consideration, I think I can prove to demonstration that this indiscriminate mode of electing the President and Vice President, affords to the smaller States a degree of influence over the election, places an important barrier to the superiority which the large States possess in this instance, and in every event, and at the worst, insures to the former a safeguard and defence against the encroachments of the latter, which they would not otherwise possess, and of which, if the proposed alteration takes place, they will be absolutely deprived.

By that article of the Constitution, to which I have so often had occasion to allude, and in which it is now the object to make so material an alteration, it is provided "that two persons shall be indiscriminately voted for as President and Vice President, by the Electors in the respective States, one of whom at least shall not be of the same State with themselves." In carrying this provision into operation, the larger States must necessarily do one of three things. They must either (in the hope of securing to themselves both the President and Vice President) give an equal number of votes to the two candidates whom they may agree upon, or at least a very large portion, if not exactly an equal number of votes to them both; or, confining themselves to the securing the office of President to the individual whom they prefer, they must be satisfied to give one of the two votes to which each of their Electors is entitled exclusively to him, and throw away the other. What follows in either case? In the first place, if two candidates have an equal vote, and at the same time a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors appointed, it devolves on the House of Representatives to select which of them they please as President; and as the Constitution has (in the spirit I have already described, and for the purpose of affording every possible check and security to the smaller States, which the nature of the thing would permit) provided, that in every instance in which the choice of the President devolves on the House of Representatives, the votes shall be taken by States, and the whole representation of each State shall have one equal vote—it follows of course that in every case of this kind, they are all, large and small, placed precisely upon an equal footing. But in the case of two or more candidates having an equal vote, yet less than a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors appointed, a further advantage accrues to the smaller States, for then, according to the Constitution, they not only vote by States, the representation of each State having one vote, but they may choose the President from the five highest candidates on the list, and of course have a wider field for choice, and a greater and even equal chance of making him President whom their Electors perhaps had originally supported as such.

In order to avoid this, suppose the larger States support two candidates, giving to the one however a few less votes than to the other. What advantages in this instance are afforded to the smaller States? Why, in the first place it gives them a greater chance of bringing in their own candidate, at least as Vice President—for their opponents, in order to secure to themselves the office of President, and to avoid an ultimate election by the House of Representatives, have not thought proper to give their full support to him whom they run as Vice President; but have thrown away from him a part of their votes. In the next place, if it is discovered (and this will not always be as difficult a point to ascertain as might at first view be supposed) how many votes are to be thrown away, the Electors of the smaller States may give an equal number of votes, and thus, putting the two candidates on an equality, bring the final election into the House of Representatives, where each State representation has an equal vote in deciding the election.

Nor is this their only alternative, for although it is true that they will not, from their inferior number of votes, have it in their power to select from all the citizens of the Union the individual whom they might prefer, yet, in the case supposed, (of the larger States giving a considerable portion, though not exactly an equal number of votes to the two candidates, whom they have determined to support,) the smaller States will at least have it at their option to choose between the two candidates, and by giving him their votes, insure the election of that one of them against whom they have the fewest objections, and who sensible that the preference given him in the election ultimately turned on their votes, and possibly not being taken from the very largest and most powerful States, would probably feel less inimical to their interests, and in fact have it less in his power to injure them.

The third and last case is that in which the large States, in order to secure the election of the individual they wish to the office of President, unite in giving one of the two votes to which each Elector is entitled exclusively to him, and throw away the other. The obvious and necessary consequence is, that the Vice Presidency remains completely at the disposal of the small States, and they make whom they please Vice President—a point of far more importance than gentlemen seem to suppose, or are perhaps aware of. It is in the first place to be recollected, that as the person who will usually be thought most worthy of being raised to the office of Chief Magistrate will most probably be advanced in years, there must be more than the common chances of his demise in the course of the term for which he was elected, and of the heir apparent, the Vice President, consequently succeeding to his station, and becoming himself in fact the President. Exclusively, however, and waiving this consideration, let it be moreover recollected, that the Senate have a part of the treaty-making power, participate in the appointment of the Judiciary, and of the other public officers, and form in short, to a certain degree, a portion of the Executive branch of the Government. Now all the States have an equal vote in the Senate, and the Vice President is ex officio President of the Senate. He enjoys therefore all the influence necessarily attached to such an office, and to the character of heir apparent; and he has, in addition, the peculiarly important right of giving the casting vote in all cases of an equality of votes in the Senate, an assembly composed of so very few members. Such then is the importance of the Vice Presidency, and such the influence and protection which in every point of view the indiscriminate mode of electing the two first officers in our Government affords. And is all this nothing, sir? Does the alteration proposed really constitute a proposition so plain, so self-evident, so unencumbered with anything like a difficulty or doubt, as not to require a moment's thought, or be worthy of the least investigation or discussion? Is it possible that any one within or without these doors will deny, after what I have just stated, that we are about to make a serious and important innovation in the vital principle, the very essence of the Constitution? Are we not in fact and in truth acting upon the maxim, "that from those who have not, that which they have shall be taken away, whilst to those who have, more shall be given?" Shall we not by this alteration lessen the chances of the smaller States, and take from them one of the most effectual checks, one of the most essential safeguards, in respect to the election of the Executive branch of the Government, which was secured to them by our national compact; and add, at the same time, to the preponderating and over-weening influence which the larger States have heretofore possessed, the evident means and moral certainty of disposing at pleasure of the whole Executive department? These must necessarily be the consequences of the proposed alteration in the Constitution; and for my own part, I must say, that it appears to me to give a death-blow to that portion of the State sovereignties which has been reserved to the several States, and that we thereby take a monstrous and more than a gigantic stride, towards that very consolidation of the States against which gentlemen have been wont of yore so bitterly to exclaim. For we may boast as much as we please; we may say what we will of our moderation, sincerity, and political virtue; we may give every security which can be devised upon parchment or upon paper, and endeavor to render it more sacred by seals, and even by oaths; still, so long as human nature remains human nature—where power exists on the one side and weakness on the other—there ever will arise ambition, and the inclination to obtain additional power on the part of the most powerful; and consequently, in proportion as you add to the means of encroachment already possessed by the large, and lessen those of defence and self-protection heretofore given to the small States, in the same proportion do you throw the latter at the mercy, and invite the aggression of the former, and thereby carry us further from a federative, and draw us nearer to a consolidated government.

I am perfectly aware, Mr. Speaker, that the ground I take is not the popular one of the present day. I well know that the principles for which I contend, and upon which our national compact was originally formed, have no longer the same influence on the public feelings, nor are they regarded in the smaller States with that degree of interest with which they were wont to be at the time the Convention met and the Constitution was adopted. The prosperity we have enjoyed for fourteen years past, under the auspices of the General Government, has happily done away State jealousies in a very considerable degree. The occurrences which have since intervened, the new interests which have sprung up, and the different shapes which parties have assumed, have all contributed to lessen the impressions and obscure the grounds and basis upon which the great bond of our Union was framed and bottomed. This happy and natural effect of the successful experiment we have made in our political association, must give pleasure to every friend of his country; and so long as the original compact which unites and forms us into a band of brothers continues to be held sacred, and no attempt is made to innovate upon and alter the principles upon which it was formed, I should rejoice as much as any man at this union of sentiment—this mutual confidence among the members of the Confederacy; but when I see (it matters not whether intentionally or from inadvertence) that advantage is about to be taken of this circumstance, that in the moment of party irritation and party zeal, and at a time when it may be truly stated that the influence and interests of the larger States are completely triumphant, and many of the smaller States, unconscious of danger, are enlisted from various causes under their banners; that at such a moment a proposition is brought forward to alter the Constitution in one of its most important features, and, under the plausible pretext of giving effect to the will of the people, the small States are at one blow to be deprived of the checks and safeguards secured to them by the Federal compact in the election of the Executive, and this important branch of the Government is henceforward and forevermore to be put entirely and exclusively into the hands of the larger States; when I see and behold all this, I acknowledge that I do feel the most serious alarm, and feeble and unavailing as my voice may be, I still deem it a duty incumbent on me, as one of the immediate citizens of a small State, no less than as a member of this House, and consequently a sworn guardian of the Constitution, to raise that voice, and loudly to protest against the innovation which it is contemplated to effect in the fundamental and vital principles of the compact which unites these States together.

I am not ignorant, however, that a very different turn has been given to this business; that the proposed alteration in the mode of electing the President and Vice President has been presented under a very different aspect to the public view. A respectable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) has indeed undertaken to give us the whole history of the amendment, as he terms it, and infers from thence, that such an alteration in the Constitution has been long contemplated and wished for by all parts of the Union. He tells us that a former member from South Carolina, the State I have the honor at this time to represent, had brought forward a proposition to the same effect; that a similar one had once originated in New Hampshire; that the State of New York had two years ago submitted to the consideration of Congress a resolution proposing in substance the very alteration now about to be adopted, and that it had been before us during both of the last sessions. All this, sir, is no doubt true, but I draw a very contrary inference from it to that of the honorable gentleman. He has proved to be sure that certain individuals, some parts even of the Union, have at different times, for party and local purposes, or from whatever cause, proposed and perhaps been desirous that an alteration of this kind should be made in the Constitution. He has proved however at the same time, and not less evidently, that the great body of the Union have always been opposed to any such change; that the public mind has not heretofore been ripe for it: and even at this moment, sir, I feel the most perfect conviction, that if the people had time and could take a correct and temperate view of the real merits of the question, if the irritation of the moment, the party feelings of the day, could be laid aside, the small States in particular could never become so wantonly felo de se—to commit such evident self-murder—if I may be allowed the expression—nor could the Constitutional majority in the two Houses of Congress, still less the Constitutional number of States, ever be found to ratify so great, so all important an innovation and change in the fundamental principles of the Federal compact. The chance of ultimate success depends, I am confident, even now, upon the party feeling and party zeal of the times, and the irritation which was excited and has been so industriously kept up since the late contested election of the President. I was myself, as you know, sir, one of the actors in that scene, and I may venture to say, that, from the peculiar situation in which I was placed, I had it in my power to judge more coolly and dispassionately of the occurrences of that day than almost any other individual in the United States. It is well known to every one who knew anything of me at the time, that I was a warm, sincere, and zealous advocate of the two gentlemen who were understood to be the Federal candidates. The majority of the Electors, however, having given the votes to the two candidates who were brought forward and supported in opposition to them, and they having been found to have equal votes, it devolved upon the House of Representatives to fix upon the one of the two characters who should fill the office of Chief Magistrate. In this state of things, it is no secret, that although we afterwards voted by ballot, that I separated from my political friends, and those of my colleagues who were on the floor, and performed the painful task of acting in direct opposition to them; I consequently voted invariably for the candidate who ultimately prevailed, and now fills the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States, until the last ballot, when I withdrew into an adjoining committee room, in order to facilitate a decision of the contest. Situated as I was, therefore, it may well be imagined that I could not be over zealous, or feel any very peculiar interest in the success of either of the two candidates who were opposed to each other. I had acted according to the best of my judgment, and in compliance with the dictates of my conscience, in voting for the one; while my political friends gave a preference to and supported the other. I could consequently take a perfectly dispassionate view of the subject, and must say that the zeal and violence of party appeared to me to give much more importance to the contested election than it was intrinsically entitled to. I showed, by my vote, my own opinion and wishes to be in favor of the person who was elected; and inasmuch as I believed that he would be more acceptable to the majority of our fellow-citizens out of doors, and more especially to those in that portion of the Union from whence I came, and of whose opinions and feelings I could judge most correctly; inasmuch, I acknowledge, that I should have regretted and deemed it a misfortune if the election had terminated differently.

But, sir, I could not then suppose, nor do I yet think, that the salvation and political happiness of the Republic depends so entirely on the election of any one man as President, however great or good he might be; nor could I persuade myself that it would be so monstrous and terrible an event, in an elective yet complicated government like ours, if, of two individuals brought forward by precisely the same description of Electors, to fill the two first offices under the Government, that one of them, whom they were supposed to hold up for the second office, (and consequently in case of accident to the other to supply his place, and be to all intents and purposes Chief Magistrate,) should have been preferred by their political opponents, and through their means have in the first instance been constitutionally elected to the highest office. I well know that of the two federal gentlemen whom I had originally advocated, although I should no doubt have given a preference myself to the one, yet I should have been perfectly satisfied to see either of them put at the head of the Government, had they had the majority and equal votes; for, I repeat it again, I cannot persuade myself that the political salvation of the Republic depends upon the election of any man as President. To me indeed it appeared, during the whole course of the election, that there was one result far more to be deprecated, and which might have given rise to consequences beyond the ken of human foresight. I frequently shuddered at the idea, that it might possibly happen, from the enthusiasm of party zeal, the violence of party prejudices, and the irritation of the moment, that neither side would give way, and the country might be left in a sort of interregnum, without executive officers, or perhaps any Constitutional means to obtain them; and it has often struck me as a peculiarly fortunate circumstance that the contest was between two individuals originally brought forward by Electors of the same political description, and not between the favorite candidates of the two opposite parties, each supported by his immediate party friends. In my humble opinion, the great desideratum, the only thing necessary to be done, is to make some provision, which would insure, in such or any other case in which the election of the Executive devolved on the House of Representatives, that a selection of one or other of the candidates should take place before the House separated, or its political dissolution took place; or that, if an election did not take place, one of the candidates, in consequence of superior age or whatever other cause of preference might be deemed most eligible, should of course be the President. I have not however touched upon the late contested election, in the intention of discussing the pro and con with respect to the relative merits of it, neither is it my intention to deny the abstract proposition, that the will and the wishes of the people ought to be consulted in elections. I wish only to show that this alteration—even allowing it for a moment to be desirable, yields but a partial remedy, to a partial and comparatively speaking trivial and temporary inconvenience, whilst we leave a most awful and very possible event unnoticed and unguarded against.

My further object has been, to recall to the recollection of this House, and, as far as my feeble voice avails, of the nation at large, that our Government is not only Republican but Federal; that the provisions of the Constitution are of a very complicated nature; that they have been formed upon the general principles of free government, so modified as to comport with those of a federative alliance; and at the same time to quiet the fears, jealousies, and apprehensions, and to compromise the clashing interests and opposite pretensions of the respective States which compose this great and flourishing Union. I beg of gentlemen therefore to pause and reflect, and then decide, whether it be really correct and agreeable to the dictates of sound sense and good policy to alter or rather totally annihilate one of the great and leading features of an original compact, in order to obviate, at the most, a momentary inconvenience. For I trust I have gone far enough to prove, whilst I venture to foretell, without pretending to the gift of prophecy, that a case similar to the one which has lately taken place will never again happen; yet that if such an event should again turn up, and of two individuals who had an equal number of the votes of all the Electors appointed, the one should be made President, (by the selection of the House of Representatives voting by States,) and in consequence of the present indiscriminate mode of election, who might not perhaps be the most immediately acceptable to the majority of all the inhabitants of the Union, taken in the aggregate, (and the inhabitants of the large States must of necessity form such a majority,) yet I say, should such an event take place in the course of things, I have I trust gone far to prove that it is at worst, but a partial, temporary, and very restricted evil, arising necessarily out of a peculiar form of government, the natural consequence of our territorial divisions and the political provisions and modifications advisedly adopted to compromise our various interests, foreseen at the time our national compact was formed, yet adopted as a minor and necessary sacrifice to prevent far greater evils; and as presenting the best, perhaps the only mode of compromising the jarring interests, of satisfying the opposite pretensions, and of quieting the jealousies, fears, and apprehensions of the various members, so unequal in size, power, population, and riches, who are at this time so happily united in one great confederacy.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is, in my humble opinion, the true point of view in which this and every other proposition to alter our national compact ought ever to be considered—such is the point of view in which the subject now under consideration has presented itself to my mind. I have therefore complied with my sense of duty and obeyed the dictates of my conscience in opposing the alteration to the Constitution, which it is now proposed to make. I know full well the popular feelings and sentiments are against me on this question, and that what falls from a gentleman on this side of the House, is, in the actual state of things, not very favorably received out of doors, and for the most part attributed merely to party feelings and party opposition. In the present instance, however, I can in honor and with truth declare that I act from no party motive or party considerations whatever. My objections and opposition to the resolution on your table, are the result of a sincere conviction in my own mind, after the most dispassionate and attentive consideration I have been able to bestow on the subject; and I most fervently pray that whilst we are endeavoring to extricate ourselves from a dilemma of secondary importance, necessarily growing out of our peculiar mode of government, and to provide a remedy against a partial inconvenience, we may not inadvertently place ourselves in a labyrinth of difficulties and expose our posterity to a multitude of evils, more fatal to the peace and happiness of this Union, than we are any of us at this time aware of.

MR. HASTINGS.—Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of going into an elaborate discussion upon the subject of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, (for that has been already very fully debated,) but merely to state some of the reasons which will influence me in voting against it. I have always believed, sir, that the Federal Constitution was as much the result of compromise and mutual concession, as of great deliberation and wisdom; and that alterations in this charter of our national union ought to be made with extreme caution. In respect to the amendment proposed, I have understood that in the Convention of delegates that framed the Constitution, variety of ways for electing President and Vice President were proposed and all rejected, until the new Constitutional one was offered, which was agreed to; with this mode of electing a President and Vice President, I am satisfied. I believe many advantages result from it; by the present mode, the Electors in giving their votes for two persons to be President and Vice President, will be induced (from the uncertainty which of the two voted for will be elected President) to give their ballots for two persons, either of whom shall be well qualified to discharge the important powers or duties of First Magistrate of the nation. But, if the proposed amendment prevails, will not the office of Vice President, in all future elections, be considered as a mere sinecure? And though the person voted for to fill the office may be well qualified to perform the duties incumbent upon him as President of the Senate, yet he may be wholly unqualified to fill the office of President of the United States, and a person in whom the American people would have no confidence as such: but by the proposed amendment, upon such unfit person—in the event of the removal of the President from office, death, resignation, or his inability to discharge the duties and powers of the office—will devolve all the duties and powers of First Magistrate. Another advantage that I conceive may be the effect of the existing Constitutional mode of electing a President and Vice President, is, that it may be the means of checking and moderating the rage and violence of party spirit, and of controlling and putting down faction, by the election of a President who may be agreeable to the wishes of the minority, and thereby produce an equilibrium of power between contending parties. Besides, sir, I fear, if the amendment obtains, that it may give a weight and influence to the large States in the Union, in the election of a President and Vice President, that they ought not to possess; and though I have the honor to be a Representative from a State of some consequence in the Union, on account of its population and resources, still I cannot wish that Massachusetts, in this or any other way, should acquire any undue advantage or improper influence over the smaller States.

In fine, the reasons and arguments that I have heard in this House in the course of the debate, particularly those offered by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, last up, (Mr. HUGER,) have convinced me that the proposed amendment ought not to be made. I will not say, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution is perfect in all its provisions; there is a particular part of it, in article first, section second, and third paragraph, that fixes the rule of representation, which I wish to see altered in due time. I wish to see this part of the Constitution altered, because I wish to see upon the floor of this House an equal representation of free citizens, and of free citizens only. As the Constitutional rule now is, the representation is made unequal. But this it will be said was also the effect of a spirit of accommodation and compromise. It was a compromise, however, by which one part of the Union has obtained a great, and in my opinion, unjust advantage over other parts of the Union. A compromise, sir, by which the Southern States have gained a very considerable increase of Representatives and Electors, founded solely upon their numerous black population. I hope, sir, that in the year 1808, an alteration will be made in this part of the Constitution, and that the representation, by being proportioned only to the number of free persons, will be rendered equal and just. I hope, also, that those gentlemen who now advocate the proposed amendment to the Constitution, will then, if members of this House, be also the advocates for altering and amending this part of the Constitution—the friends and advocates of an equal representation, founded upon the population of free persons only. I will not occupy the attention of the House with further observations, or repeat what has already been said by gentlemen against the amendment: I will only say that, in my opinion, it is neither necessary nor expedient to make the proposed alteration in the Constitution, and that I hope it will not be made.

MR. THATCHER.—Having waited in expectation of hearing the arguments of gentlemen in favor of the resolution, I feel great regret at the silence which they have thought proper on this occasion to observe. This course, though not entirely novel, was not anticipated upon a question of great national importance; a subject which invites, which demands investigation.

OCTOBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

My colleague (Mr. EUSTIS) has stated to the House that, in the year 1797, the Legislature of Massachusetts voted to instruct the Senators and to request the Representatives of that State in Congress, to propose an alteration of the Constitution similar to that now proposed. A gentleman from New York (Mr. THOMAS) has informed us that a similar vote passed in the Legislature of that State. As these two statements are the only answers (if such they can be considered) to the various arguments which have this day been adduced in opposition to the resolution, and as the gentlemen who have made them appear to consider these votes of the State Legislatures obligatory upon the members of the House who now represent those States, I beg leave to state as succinctly as possible some of the reasons which will induce me to vote against the resolution.

An amendment of the Constitution must be sanctioned not only by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, but must be ratified by three-fourths of the State Legislatures. The Constitution considers these different Assemblies as entirely independent of each other. They must act with perfect independence upon this subject, or this provision of the Constitution is virtually destroyed. Most certainly the resolution of a State Legislature, in 1797, ought not to control the votes of members of this House in 1803. It is, I conceive, not only their right, but their duty to decide upon this question with the most perfect independence of opinion.

It has been already urged that the Constitutional mode of electing the President and Vice President is admirably calculated to disappoint intrigue and prevent corruption. Should an aspiring and dangerous faction obtain the ascendancy in this country, this mode of election affords the means of counteracting its influence, of checking its control. For although such a party will make the greatest exertions to elect that leader who may chance to be the idol of the day, while the Electors are obliged to vote for two candidates, without designating which is intended, those Electors who are not devoted to the interest of the ruling faction will exercise a preference of great importance, they will select the candidate least exceptionable.

The article, which this resolution proposes to alter, has always been considered as the great barrier and shield of the smaller States against the encroachments of the large. By the present mode of election, provided it is effected by the Electors, each State has its due proportion of influence. If it be decided by the House of Representatives, the Constitution has put the States upon the ground of perfect equality. But, if the proposed alteration takes place, it will undermine the very basis of the Confederacy; it will throw the whole power, in this most important election, into the hands of a few States exclusively. With the present population five States may, by combination, exclude the other twelve from all participation in the choice. It will be totally impossible, by any precaution whatever, to prevent such a combination.

The situation of the States forming the Federal Constitution, and the nature of the compact itself, furnish strong evidence of the policy of the article under consideration. It was absolutely necessary that some of the rights of the individual States should be secured for the interest and safety of all. This Constitution, to use the language of the Convention who framed it, "was the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable." Upon no other principle is it possible to account for that article of the Constitution which provides for the representation of slaves. This article operates with peculiar inequality in the Northern and Eastern States.

The representation of slaves adds thirteen members to this House in the present Congress, and eighteen Electors of President and Vice President at the next election. Yet the whole of New England contains but thirteen hundred and thirty-one slaves. Massachusetts and Vermont have none.

The New England States have submitted to this inequality, sensible of the extreme danger of tampering with the Constitution. But, if it is to be altered, justice requires that the article authorizing the representation of slaves should be the first to receive amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the objections to the article proposed to be altered are plausible—they are popular; but I am confident that, upon close examination of the different modes of electing our First Magistrate which have been proposed, none will be found to combine so many advantages as that prescribed by the Constitution. The Journal of the Convention evinces that this was a subject of long discussion and mature deliberation. It was devised by a most illustrious assembly of sages and patriots; it was adopted at a time when the heat of party had not influenced the country; shall we then, at a time when party feelings animate all parts of the Union, shall we destroy one of the firmest pillars of our political fabric? I trust, sir, we shall not venture into the boundless region of hypothesis, that we shall not alter one of the fundamental principles of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. J. C. SMITH rose and observed, that the friends of the resolution had been so occupied with its details, he feared they had lost sight of its principle. And he was not a little confirmed in this suspicion, from their profound silence on the present occasion. But as he felt so, he could not but express a faint hope that a Constitutional majority of the House would not be found to yield their assent to the proposition. Mr. S. said, it was worthy of remark that no alteration had yet been made in the national compact. Of the eleven articles subjoined to the Constitution as amendments, ten were mere declarations of certain rights, not materially affected by that instrument, and which had their origin in State jealousy, and the remaining one was intended only to settle the construction of an article in the Constitution which had before been considered of doubtful import; he alluded to the amendment respecting the suability of States.

It had been repeatedly acknowledged, Mr. S. said, by gentlemen on all sides of the House, that the Constitution of the United States was an affair of compromise—the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession. But was there a gentleman on that floor who could inform what were the precise terms to that compromise? What sacrifices were made? What equivalents were given? If so, he would thank him to state to the House what mighty boon was accorded to the eastern section of the nation in return for that remarkable provision of the Constitution, which permits slaves to become a basis of representation in that House, and which indeed renders them no inefficient agents even in the choice of the Chief Magistrate himself. For his part, Mr. S. said, he would confess he knew not what recompense could have been adequate to so extraordinary a concession. In truth, neither he nor any other member present could declare the exact manner in which the jarring interests, the conflicting claims of the several States, were adjusted in Convention. It, therefore, became a matter not only of delicacy but of extreme hazard, to touch the instrument with ever so slight a hand, lest the arrangement, thus happily made, should be broken down and destroyed.

Mr. S. said, he had ever understood the smaller States were, in Convention, peculiarly tenacious of that particular provision in the Constitution which was now proposed to be modified. The reasons were apparent—and they had been so clearly and forcibly stated by the gentleman who had preceded him, that it was quite unnecessary for him to detain the House upon that point. The consequence of those States, in the election of President, was thereby, in some measure, preserved; they were enabled, in some degree, to counteract any combination which might be formed between four or five of the larger States to keep the office of Chief Magistrate in perpetual rotation among themselves. But, Mr. S. said, cogent as these reasons were, he apprehended they were not the only object of the provision. He said, it was no doubt desirable that the Executive power of the Government should be vested in an individual; but the Convention must have perceived, as indeed it was very obvious, that such an office in an elective Government must become a prodigious lure to ambition; that as the power, the patronage, the duration, and the emoluments of the office were augmented, in the same proportion would be the violence of competition between rival candidates, in the same proportion would the order and tranquillity of the nation be endangered at the return of every election. This evil, so formidable in its nature, if not rescinded, is at least mitigated by the existing provision of the Constitution. For, while it effectually secures to the nation an eventual choice, it places it wholly beyond the reach of any candidate to calculate confidently on the issue of his pretensions. Such an uncertainty, arising not from the casualties incident to ordinary elections, but from the circumstance that even a majority of the electoral votes may not ultimately secure the office, must ever form a powerful check to corrupt or ambitious views. The aspiring demagogue, willing to barter wealth for distinction, would hardly be induced to lavish his treasures upon so hazardous an experiment. And even the man in possession of the office would scarcely be tempted to use unworthy means to retain it, when its preservation must be so much a thing of chance. It was, (Mr. S. said,) to complete this refined process; to complicate it in such a manner as to effectuate this great object alone, that the office of Vice President was instituted. And I demand of gentlemen what apology they will make to the American people for retaining this officer if the present amendment is to prevail? What duties has he to perform other than such as are devolved upon the Speaker of the House? Why will you pay him five thousand dollars, annually, merely to preside in the deliberations of the Senate, who might as well elect one of their own body for that purpose? And why, sir, will you keep here a high officer, with a liberal salary, for no other earthly purpose than to enable him, from his proximity to the Government, to cabal with greater effect for the succession? If pretensions to economy rest not solely in profession, gentlemen will now abolish this sinecure; they will finish their amendment by expunging the office of Vice President from the Constitution.

Mr. S. said he would close his remarks by seriously asking gentlemen whether the present resolution had not grown out of an overweening anxiety to secure, at all hazards, the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate?

The SPEAKER said it was improper to introduce the Chief Magistrate into the debate.

Mr. SMITH said he was not about to speak disrespectfully of the President, but he would say that no modification whatever of the Constitution, having for its object either to enlarge the power, or to facilitate the attainment of that office, ought to be attempted, so long as the incumbent, whoever he may be, is considered as a candidate for a re-election. Sir, said Mr. S., I will again ask gentlemen, whether they will suffer themselves to be influenced on this great question by their predilection for an individual? Are they prepared to immolate the Constitution of their country upon an altar erected to private friendship and personal esteem? Will they remember that the conservative Senate of France “desirous of furnishing a proof of national gratitude,” proposed to the French people, to amend their Constitution by creating Napoleon Bonaparte Consul for life! If the two cases are not altogether parallel, who can say there is much difference in principle? And who, sir, will be answerable for the consequences, if the National Legislature will permit themselves to be governed by considerations of a personal nature, when acting upon a subject infinitely momentous, not only to themselves but to remotest posterity?

Mr. THOMAS said that he was in favor of the amendment as it then stood in the resolution, and hoped that it would receive the support of a Constitutional majority of that House. At the same time, he confessed that he should have been better satisfied had it gone no further than to designate the President and Vice President, because he thought the more it was trammelled with detailed provisions, the greater the hazard of its final ratification by the respective State Legislatures.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

He was not at all alarmed at the variety of opinions which had been expressed on that question, even by those in favor of the general principle. On a subject of so much importance to the welfare of this country, it was natural to expect a difference of sentiment, as to its bearings, and the lengths to which it ought to go. He was happy, however, to find the appearance of a disposition on the part of those honorable gentlemen to concur in passing the amendment, since it embraced the important object of designation, although it was not shaped exactly agreeable to their wishes. He rejoiced to find that, with respect to the great principle contained in the resolution, there appeared but one opinion in that House, unless it was from a quarter from whence we look for opposition on all occasions.

On this question, however, said Mr. T., I do confess that I am greatly disappointed in finding two of my honorable colleagues (Mr. LIVINGSTON and Mr. G. GRISWOLD) hostile to this measure; considering that the Legislature of the State from which those gentlemen are Representatives, in January, 1803, unanimously recommended, in the most impressive terms, the adoption of this amendment to our Constitution, notwithstanding at that time a respectable minority of one branch, and a large majority of the other, coincided with those gentlemen in political sentiment. Knowing this, Mr. Speaker, I did expect, and I think I had a right to expect, different conduct on the part of those honorable gentlemen on this occasion. With the permission of the House, he would read a letter addressed to him as a Representative of the State of New York, on that floor, by the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Assembly of that State, enclosing two resolutions, one of which embraced this object.

[Here Mr. T. read the letter alluded to, and then remarked, that it was not his intention to enter into the merits of the question; he only rose with a view to state this circumstance, and to express his disappointment in finding those gentlemen opposed to this amendment.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he should not have risen but for the remark of his colleague, (Mr. THOMAS.) He had, at the time alluded to, the honor to be a member of the Legislature of New York, but he was in a small minority. He had then the same opinion of the majority as at present. He did not, therefore, imagine that anything that came from him would succeed, and did not think it in the least useful to oppose himself to the torrent.

Mr. EUSTIS did not rise to discuss the merits of the amendment, but to answer the call of his colleague, (Mr. HASTINGS.) In 1797, as well as he recollected, the Assembly of Massachusetts instructed their Senators and advised their Representatives to vote for an amendment to the Constitution, founded on the same principle with the present amendment. He presumed the gentleman from Massachusetts was ignorant of this fact, or he would not oppose the voice of the people of that State.

Mr. HASTINGS confessed his ignorance of this circumstance. But, had he known it, he should not have considered himself bound to make sacrifice of his own opinion to such instructions. He had no idea that, when a person was chosen to represent the people, he was under any obligation to pursue a line of conduct contrary to the dictates of his own mind, whatever might be the instructions of his constituents. If, after a thorough consideration of a measure, which he should be thus instructed to vote for, he should be convinced that it would operate against the interest of his constituents, he asked if he were not under a solemn obligation to act in opposition to his instructions? Because such measure, if carried into effect, might operate to the disadvantage, perhaps destruction, of the public good. He would not, however, enter into a discussion of this point, but satisfy himself with saying that, if he was instructed by every free citizen of Massachusetts to vote for a measure, which, after mature reflection, he was convinced would prove injurious, he should pursue the dictates of his own judgment and vote against it.

Mr. DANA.—It is extraordinary that the gentleman (Mr. EUSTIS) should rise to make this explanation. Does he mean to say to the Representatives of the people, the State Legislatures may issue their mandates to you, and though they are not your constituents, you shall, nevertheless, obey them? They are not our constituents; they are not authorized to give us instructions; and we are not bound to obey them when given.

Mr. EUSTIS said, he had barely risen to give the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts information; he had not expected to call up his champion from Connecticut, behind him. He had risen merely to state a fact, for the information of his colleague, as, from the observations he had made, it might be inferred that the State of Massachusetts was adverse to the principle of this amendment. It was far from his intention to oppose the sentiments of the Legislature of Massachusetts to the will of that House. He honored the independence his colleague expressed. It was, to be sure, an independence that went to the utmost limit a Representative could have of his constituents. Yet, he did not censure him for asserting it.*

* On a subsequent day, Mr. Eustis stated that he had made inquiry respecting the instructions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, to which he had on a preceding day referred, without having been able to obtain satisfactory information. He was inclined to think he had been in error in stating their existence; and, with this impression on his mind, he considered it due to his colleague (Mr. Hastings) to render an apology for the remarks he had applied to him.

Since the period of the above debate, a letter has been addressed to the Secretary of the Commonwealth

Mr. THOMAS asked his colleague, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) as a member of the Legislature of New York when instructions were given to vote for a similar amendment, whether a majority of the Senate of that State were not of the same political sentiments with himself?

Mr. LYON said, he should not have risen on this occasion had he not heard the old subject of irritation harped upon. Gentlemen opposed to the amendment of the Constitution, under consideration, had introduced the hackneyed topic of the representation of the slaves, and talked of that as being a sacrifice in the formation of the compact on the part of the States who held no slaves, and as included in the general compromise; for himself, although he had formerly the honor of representing a State where there were no slaves, and now had the honor of representing a State where slavery is allowed of, he had not changed his opinion, nor held two opinions on the subject; he always considered the article of the Constitution alluded to as containing the compromise on that subject within itself, and that the sacrifice was on the part of the people where slavery is admissible. Numbers was agreed on as the basis of representation; it certainly was the best criterion to form an estimation of the property and of the ability of the States to contribute to the public expenditure; but the States where the blacks were free, say to the States where the blacks were slaves, your slaves must not be counted in the numbers to be represented. The natural reply was, why not count our black people as well as you count yours? we enter not into your local policy, nor examine what kind of freedom you allow to black or white; yet they gave up two-fifths of their slaves as a compromise, so the sacrifice was made by them. For my own part, said Mr. L., the opportunity I have had of feeling the operation of both the freedom and the slavery of the black people, convinces me that the blacks who are slaves are much more useful and beneficial to the community and to the nation, according to their number, than those that are free; and I always have considered this subject, when brought up, as mere matter of exclamation, and intended to create popular murmur and discontent.

On the question whether the resolution should pass, it was carried in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 31, as follows:

IN SENATE, Feb. 28, 1800.

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Vermont, on the fifth day of November last, passed two resolves, in the words following, viz:

“STATE OF VERMONT.

“In General Assembly, Nov. 5, 1799.

“Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be, and they hereby are, requested to use their best endeavors that Congress propose to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, viz: That the Electors of President and Vice President in giving in their votes, shall respectively distinguish the person whom they desire to be President from the one they desire to be Vice President, by annexing the word President or Vice President, as the case may require, to the proper name voted for; and the person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors chosen, shall be Vice President; and if there be no choice, and two or more persons shall have the highest number of votes, and those equal, the Senate shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for Vice President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list, the Senate shall in like manner choose the Vice President; but in choosing the Vice President, the votes shall be taken by States, the Senators from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States; and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And in case the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress, shall find that the aforesaid amendment is not conformable to the sentiments of a Constitutional majority of both branches of the National Legislature, they are hereby requested so to modify the same as to meet the sentiments of such majority.

“Provided, however, That any amendment which may be agreed on, shall oblige the Electors to designate the person they desire to be President, from the one whom they desire to be Vice President.

“Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested forthwith to transmit the same to the Supreme Executives of the several States.”

Which resolves have been communicated by the Supreme Executive of the State of Vermont to the Supreme Executive of this Commonwealth.

Resolved, That the Legislature of this Commonwealth have a high sense of the wisdom and patriotism of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, and accord with them in the opinion, that it is expedient that the Constitution of the United States be amended in the manner contemplated in the aforesaid resolves of the Legislature of the State of Vermont.

Resolved, further, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to adopt these necessary measures to effect the amendment aforesaid.

Resolved, further, That his Honor the Lieutenant Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate the foregoing resolves to the Supreme Executive of the State of Vermont, and also to transmit copies thereof to the Senators and Representatives of this Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States.

LOUISIANA TREATY.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April last, and for the temporary government thereof," together with the amendments agreed to yesterday, was read the second time, as follows:

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of and occupy the territory ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April last, between the two nations; and that he may for that purpose, and in order to maintain in the said territories the authority of the United States, employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the force authorized by an act passed the third day of March last, entitled "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals," which he may deem necessary, and so much of the sum appropriated by the said act as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying this act into effect; to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, until the expiration of the present session of Congress, or unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the said territories, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the same, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the full enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

On the question, Shall the bill pass? the yeas and nays were required, and stood—yeas 89, nays 23, as follows:

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following bill:

A bill for carrying into effect the Convention of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America, and the French Republic.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the thirtieth day of April eighteen hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constituted, certificates of stock, signed by the Register of the Treasury, in favor of the French Republic, or of its assignees, for the sum of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, from the time when possession of New Orleans shall have been obtained, in conformity with the treaty of the thirtieth day of April, eighteen hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and in other respects conformable with the tenor of the convention aforesaid; and the President of the United States is authorized to cause the said certificates of stock to be delivered to the Government of France, or to such person or persons as shall be authorized to receive them, in three months at most, after the exchange of ratifications of the treaty aforesaid, and after Louisiana shall be taken possession of in the name of the Government of the United States; and credit or credits to the proprietors thereof, shall thereupon be entered and given on the books of the Treasury, in like manner as for the present domestic funded debt, which said credits or stock shall thereafter be transferable only on the books of the Treasury of the United States, by the proprietor or proprietors of such stock, his, her, or their attorney: And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged for the payment of the interest, and for the reimbursement of the principal of the stock, in conformity with the provisions of the said convention: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, with the approbation of the President of the United States, and with the assent of the proprietors of the said stock vary the terms and instalments fixed by the convention for its reimbursement: And provided also, That every proprietor of the said stock may, until otherwise directed by law, on surrendering his certificate of such stock, receive another to the same amount, and bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable quarterly at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the annual interest accruing on the said stock, which may, in conformity with the convention aforesaid, be payable in Europe, shall be paid at the rate of four shillings and sixpence sterling for each dollar if payable in London, and at the rate of two guilders and one half a guilder, current money of Holland, for each dollar if payable in Amsterdam.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That a sum equal to what will be necessary to pay the interest which may accrue on the said stock to the end of the present year, be, and the same is hereby appropriated for that purpose, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the end of the present year (in addition to the annual sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, yearly appropriated to the sinking fund by virtue of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States,") a further annual sum of seven hundred thousand dollars, to be paid out of the duties on merchandise and tonnage, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated to the said fund, making in the whole an annual sum of eight millions of dollars, which shall be vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund in the same manner, shall be applied by them for the same purposes, and shall be, and continue appropriated until the whole of the present debt of the United States, inclusively of the stock created by virtue of this act, shall be reimbursed and redeemed, under the same limitations as have been provided by the first section of the above-mentioned act respecting the annual appropriation of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, made by the same.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the said further sum of seven hundred thousand dollars to be paid to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, in the same manner as was directed by the above-mentioned act, respecting the annual appropriation of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to cause to be applied and paid out of the said fund, yearly and every year, at the Treasury of the United States, such sum and sums as may be actually wanted to discharge the annual interest and charges accruing on the stock created by virtue of this act, and the several instalments or parts of principal of the said stock, as the same shall become due and may be discharged, in conformity to the terms of the convention aforesaid, and of this act.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD proposed to amend the fifth section by introducing near the end thereof, after the word "conformity," the following words: "to the provisions of the said act, entitled 'An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States.'"

Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. NICHOLSON considered the amendment as altogether useless. After some consideration, it was lost without a division.

Mr. EUSTIS moved to substitute in the first section, the word "Louisiana" in room of New "Orleans," making the payment of interest on the stock commence at the period when possession of Louisiana, instead of New Orleans, shall have been obtained. Agreed to without a division.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill with this amendment, and the House immediately took up the report and concurred therein; when the bill was ordered, without a division, to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

SATURDAY, October 29.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, KILLIAN K. VAN RENSSELAER, and from South Carolina, THOMAS LOWNDES, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, the payment of which has been assumed by the Government of the United States, by virtue of the convention with the French Government of the thirtieth of April.

The bill appropriates $3,750,000, inclusive of $2,000,000 appropriated the last session, and authorizes the President to borrow, at a rate of six per cent., $1,750,000.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved an additional section appropriating $20,000 for compensation to commissioners, secretary, and agent for investigating claims, and for contingencies. This sum was afterwards reduced, at the instance of Mr. R., to $18,750.

The Committee agreed to the amendment, and reported the bill so amended. The House immediately took up the report of the Committee, and agreed thereto, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day.

The bill was afterwards read the third time and passed without a division.

LOUISIANA TREATY.

An engrossed bill for carrying into effect the convention of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic, was read the third time, and on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 7, as follows:

Resolved, That the title be, "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of eleven million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris, on the thirtieth of April last, and for the temporary government thereof," and desire a conference with this House, on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their said amendments, disagreed to by the Senate, and doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter thereof; and that Mr. RANDOLPH, jr., Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. SANDFORD, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House.

LOST CERTIFICATES.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called the attention of the House to the subject of lost certificates. He said that he was not prepared to move a general question; but he would offer a specific case, which might bring the whole matter before the House.

He alluded to the case of Philip Bush, on which the Commissioners had never made a report. The Committee of Claims, he said, declined proceeding until the Senate determined upon the subject, and the Senate decided in favor of those who held lost certificates. The House of Representatives refused to concur, and the matter rests. He therefore moved that the case of Philip Bush be referred to a select committee. He said, that he did not wish to interfere with the Committee of Claims, and whether a select committee should determine for or against the petition, it would gain the opinion of the House.

Mr. LEIB said that, if he recollected right, the petition of Philip Bush had been long before the House, and he had hoped there had been an end to it; but he was willing that it should go to a Committee of Claims in order to preserve uniformity.

Mr. SMILIE asserted that it was a rule of the House, that, when once a petition had been decided upon, it could not again be taken up. He thought it a good rule; if it was not so, there would be no end to applications; they would engross the whole time of the House. He knew not, he said, what the petition was; but if it contained anything material to be brought before the House, a new petition could be presented; but he did not wish to deviate from established rules.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The gentleman who spoke last is perfectly right, provided the fact was as he conceives; but the petition of Philip Bush was never decided upon. The House refused to concur with the report of the Committee of Claims. He had, he said, looked into the records of the Journals, but the leaves were either misplaced or it was not noticed; he therefore thought a new petition would be best, for he should feel great pleasure in hearing the question discussed. There had been many great sufferers by lost certificates, and it was high time to make them satisfaction.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—The Committee of Claims made a general report in the year 1800; but I know not whether the petition in question was rejected or not.

Mr. R. then proceeded to search the Journals; which taking up considerable time—

Mr. EUSTIS asked, whether any business was before the House?

The SPEAKER replied, that the Journals were being examined.

Mr. SMILIE said, until it could be ascertained, it had best be deferred.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied that, to oblige his friend, he would for the present withdraw the motion, though he thought that there was sufficient proof before the House that the petition had not been decided upon.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury was then read, which stated in answer to an application made to him; that there were several Journals of the House in his office; but not more than were necessary for the despatch of business of the department.

Referred to a select committee.

Mr. MITCHELL then moved, that a committee be appointed to consider on the expediency of reprinting the Journals of the House.

Mr. HUGER observed, that he wished the word "documents" to be added to the motion. He wished the documents from the first time of the sitting of Congress to be reprinted. He observed, that only two copies of those valuable records were in the possession of the House, and in the first volume there was most important business.

After some observations on the words of the motion, it was agreed to.

MOURNING FOR EDMUND PENDLETON.

Mr. EUSTIS rose and observed, that within a few days past the House were called upon to take notice of an event which perhaps would be more interesting to posterity than to the present generation; the death of one of those illustrious patriots who, by a life devoted to his country, had bequeathed a name and an example to posterity which he would not attempt to describe. He had information that another of these sages, EDMUND PENDLETON, of Virginia, had paid the last tribute to nature.

On this occasion he begged leave to offer to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House, impressed with a lively sense of the important services rendered to his country by EDMUND PENDLETON, deceased, will wear a badge of mourning for thirty days, as an emblem of their veneration for his illustrious character, and of their regret that another star is fallen from the splendid constellation of virtue and talents which guided the people of the United States in their struggle for Independence.

The resolution was immediately taken up, and agreed to—ayes 77.

MONDAY, October 31.

Another member, to wit: TOMPSON J. SKINNER, from Massachusetts, appeared produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Ordered, That the select committee of seventeen members, appointed on the twentieth instant, to whom were referred two motions for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the election of President and Vice President, be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jr., from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend a conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the Territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirteenth of April last, and for the temporary government thereof," reported that the conferees, on the part of this House, did meet the conferees on the part of the Senate, who agreed to report to their House certain modifications of the said amendments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments insisted on by this House to the bill, sent to the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the Territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April last, and for the temporary government thereof."

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the relief of the owners of the Danish brigantine Henrick, taken by a French privateer in 1799, retaken by an armed vessel of the United States, carried into a neutral island, and there adjudged to be neutral, but under allowance of such salvage and costs as absorbed nearly the whole amount of sales of the vessel and cargo.

Ordered, That the said motion, together with a report of the Secretary of State, communicated by a message to this House, from the President of the United States, on the twenty-third of February last, and the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee of Claims; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed on the seventeenth instant, to prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceeding as are proper to be observed in this House; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the same.

Ordered, That the consideration of the said report be postponed until to-morrow.

Resolved, That the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on a motion of the twenty-eighth instant, for the appointment of a committee "to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States for certain balances reported to be due from several of the States to the United States, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts of the individual States with the United States, with power to report by bill, or otherwise," be postponed until the first Monday in December next.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to bring in a bill or bills making an appropriation for carrying into effect the seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jr., from the committee last mentioned, presented a bill making an appropriation for carrying into effect the seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed on the seventeenth ultimo to prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceeding as are proper to be observed in this House, to which the Committee of the whole House, yesterday, reported their agreement; and the resolution contained therein, being twice read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Rules and Orders established and observed by the late House of Representatives, be adopted by this House.

Mr. JACKSON moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That provision be made by law for the application of one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of the land lying within the State of Ohio, sold or to be sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and two, to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio river, and to the said State of Ohio, in conformity with the act of Congress, entitled "An act to enable the people of the western division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes;" passed upon the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, as well as the act passed the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and three, in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act aforesaid, and the ordinance of the Convention of the State of Ohio, bearing date the twenty-ninth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and two.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The motion for excluding strangers from the floor of the House was resumed.

Mr. CLAIBORNE spoke against the motion. He did not think that a certain part of the citizens (females) should be excluded from their right of hearing the debates. They had a curiosity to be gratified, and they were interested in the proceedings of the House. It would be inferred that they had transgressed, by being debarred at this time. He had ever observed that they have conducted themselves in a manner that gave no interruption to the business pending in the House. He should therefore vote against the resolution.

Mr. EARLY replied, that he had but one single observation to add, which was, that it was not the particular class of citizens referred to who caused the interruption, but the members themselves, when they were present. They would remain peaceable, if gentlemen who attended them did not occasion the complaint.

Mr. CLAIBORNE wished members so offending to be reprimanded, by name, from the Chair.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. VARNUM moved the order of the day on making provision for carrying into effect the seventh article of the British Treaty, and the House went into a Committee—Mr. J. C. SMITH in the Chair.

The bill was read and agreed to, without a division.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, was proceeding to read the bill—when

Mr. R. GRISWOLD observed, that the seventh section provides that the Commissioners shall examine claims, and award thereon. The article in the present bill says, that interest of six per cent. shall be allowed upon the claim. He thought this improper; he wished the interest to take place upon the award being made, and he should therefore move to strike out the word "claim," and insert "award."

Mr. EARLY said, he did not rise to oppose the amendment, but to observe that he thought it improper to proceed upon the business in the absence of the gentleman who moved it, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH,) he therefore moved the postponement until to-morrow; upon which a division took place—yeas 60, nays 32.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, it was

Resolved, that a committee be appointed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether any additional provisions are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings in each State shall be authenticated, so as to take effect in every other State."

Ordered, That Messrs. NICHOLSON, GRIFFIN, and HOLLAND, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. DAWSON said he had, last session, submitted two resolutions respecting post roads, which had not been acted upon; he therefore renewed them, in substance, as follows:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the establishment of post roads throughout the United States.

2. Resolved, That whatever money received from the Post Office shall remain, after defraying the expenses of the same, be appropriated to the fixing and improvement of the post roads.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Monday.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the eighteenth ultimo, the petition of Amey Dardin, presented on the third of February last, made a report thereupon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

WEDNESDAY, November 2.

A remonstrance and memorial of Zachariah Cox, a citizen of the United States, was presented to the House and read, stating certain injuries which he sustained in his person and property, some time in the year 1798, in the Mississippi Territory, and at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, by a body of armed men, belonging to the army, commanded by officers in the service of the United States, and by the proceedings of the Judge of a Federal Court; and praying that such redress may be afforded in the premises, as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said remonstrance and memorial be referred to Messrs. EARLY, THOMAS M. RANDOLPH, PURVIANCE, SKINNER, and LEWIS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings, in each State, shall be authenticated, so as to take effect in every other State;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for carrying into effect the 7th article of the British Treaty.

An amendment, not affecting the principle of the bill, being made at the instance of Mr. R. GRISWOLD, and Mr. J. RANDOLPH, the bill was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL called the attention of the House to a subject of considerable importance, growing out of our possessions on the Mississippi. He stated that the mail to the Natchez was at present transported by a route circuitous and difficult of performance. The Cherokee country, which constituted a part of it, was so destitute of water and articles of subsistence, as to render it necessary for the conveyer of the mail to carry whatever himself or his horse required. Even the water used was carried in goat skins. A great portion of the country was likewise infested with robbers. The measure he proposed was to inquire by what means the carriage of the mail to the Natchez and New Orleans could be facilitated, so as to abridge the time now consumed, and lessen the dangers and difficulties attending the transportation. Mr. M. believed a route might be pursued whereby four hundred miles could be saved in the present distance to the Natchez. Mr. M. desired such an inquiry to be made into the means of accomplishing this important object, as should, while it tended to promote the great political and commercial interests of the country, convince the Indian tribes that our object was not to invade their rights. He further observed that the usual voyage to New Orleans was about thirty days. If the route by land should be improved, that place might be probably reached in ten days. He therefore offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be directed to inquire by what means the mail may be conveyed with greater facility and dispatch, than it is at present, between the City of Washington, and the Natchez and New Orleans.

Agreed to without a division.

THURSDAY, November 3.

Ordered, That the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the two western counties of the Indiana Territory of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, be referred to Mr. LUCAS, Mr. MORROW, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. LYON, and Mr. CLAGGETT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for carrying into effect the seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWSON laid on the table a motion for continuing for — years the act of April, 1799, for augmenting the salaries of certain officers.

Mr. JACKSON observed that when he submitted a resolution for the application of one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of land sold in Ohio, he did not expect there would exist that diversity of opinion, which he had since learned did exist, in relation to the construction of the ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory. In order to give time for such a full investigation of the subject, as might, in its issue, be satisfactory to the State of Ohio, he moved a postponement of the consideration of the resolution, until the third Monday in November.—Agreed to.

FRIDAY, November 4.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting information of an act of hostility committed on a merchant vessel of the United States by an armed ship of the Emperor of Morocco.

The said Message, and letter transmitted therewith, were read, and referred to Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, Mr. SANDS, Mr. M'CREEERY, and Mr. DANA, to examine and report upon the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock to the amount of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of carrying into effect the Convention of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic; and making provision for the payment of the same," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the amendment of the Senate, together with the bill, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House to whom was referred, on the first instant, a report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Amey Dardin, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said petition and report be recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LYON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for suspending the collection of duties in the ports of the United States on all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the territory ceded to the United States by the Treaty of Paris, of the thirtieth of April last, as well as for the reimbursement of such duties as shall have been paid on such articles since the ratification of the said treaty.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. EARLY, in order to attract the attention of the House to a subject of some importance, that it might obtain an early decision, moved the following resolution.

Resolved, That the petition of John F. Randolph and Randolph McGillis, in behalf of themselves and others, presented to this House at the last session, together with the report of the Secretary of War, accompanied with sundry documents respecting claims against the United States, for services of the militia of Georgia, made the 6th February, 1803, and also the report of the select committee thereon, made on the 10th of the same month, be referred to the Committee of Claims." The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH invited the attention of the House to a subject of some importance to the revenue. Under an existing law a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans was allowed. Should this act remain in force, goods sufficient to supply the Mississippi Territory and the other western country for several years might be stored in the warehouses of New Orleans, which, on possession being taken by the United States, may be carried into the United States, thereby evading the payment of duties. He therefore moved a resolution for the repeal of that act.

Resolution agreed to, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. NEWTON said he held in his hand a resolution, which it was not his wish should be immediately acted upon, but at a future day. It would be recollected that during the last session the propriety of repealing the bankrupt law had come under the consideration of the House; but that, owing to the lateness of the day, its consideration had been postponed. As he was desirous that the subject should be investigated this session, he made the following motion:

Resolved, That the act entitled an act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States ought to be repealed.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for the 21st inst.

Mr. EARLY said he held in his hand a manuscript copy of the original report of the Commissioners who had settled the accounts between the United States and the several States; as a document, throwing much light on this subject, he moved that it might be printed.—Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, a resolution laid by him on the table for continuing for — years an act augmenting certain salaries, was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Monday next.

Mr. ELLIOT offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and if any, what, provision was necessary to be made to produce a more general circulation of copper coin throughout the United States.—Agreed to, and a committee of five appointed.

MONDAY, November 7.

Another member, to wit: OLIVER PHELPS, from New York, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of

New York, was presented to the House and read, stating certain grievances and losses to which a number of the citizens of the said State have been and are now subjected, in consequence of the unjust and oppressive practices committed by collectors appointed under an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" and submitting to the consideration of Congress sundry propositions for redress therein, which they pray may be adopted; or that such other relief may be afforded in the premises as may be best calculated to remedy the evils of which the petitioners complain.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a report and estimates of appropriation necessary for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and four; also, a statement of receipts and expenditures at the Treasury of the United States for one year preceding the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and three; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Jr., from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill; entitled "An act authorizing the creation of a stock, to the amount of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of carrying into effect the Convention of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and making provision for the payment of the same," reported that the committee had had the said amendment under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendment of the Senate at the Clerk's table. And on the question that the House do concur with the Committee of Ways and Means in their agreement to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, on the twenty-eighth ultimo, a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, with sundry accompanying documents, relative to a survey of the harbor in the island of Nantucket, in the State of Massachusetts, and of the bar and shoals near the same, made a report thereon; which was read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said report and accompanying documents, together with a petition of the inhabitants of the island and town of Nantucket, presented the eleventh of February last, be referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a motion of the fourth instant relative to a farther continuance of an act passed the second of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their agreement to the same, as amended.

The House then proceeded to consider the said motion at the Clerk's table; and the resolution contained therein, as amended by the Committee of the Whole, being twice read in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That an act passed on the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned," which was revived and continued in force by an act passed on the fourteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, ought to be farther continued for the term of two years from the first day of January next:

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the said resolution, and passed in the negative.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for fixing the salaries of certain officers in the several Executive Departments of Government:

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

TUESDAY, November 8.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire and report by bill, or otherwise, whether a drawback of duties ought not to be allowed on sugar refined in the United States, and exported to foreign ports or places.

WEDNESDAY, November 9.

A petition of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Assistants of the city of Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, in Common Council assembled, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will confirm to the petitioners the title of such lots and land, for the use of the said city, as may be found vacant within the present limits thereof.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. LATTIMORE, Mr. ALSTON, and Mr. STEDMAN, to examine and report thereon.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from the counties of Botetourt and Amherst, in the State of Virginia, relative to the contested elections of Thomas Lewis and Thomas M. Randolph, two of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

THURSDAY, November 10.

Another member, to wit, JAMES GILLESPIE, from North Carolina, appeared, produced, his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, jun., from the committee appointed, presented a bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;' which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of exempting pilots from paying hospital money for their apprentices; and that they have power to report by bill, or otherwise.

FRIDAY, November 11.

The House met, but transacted little or no business, and adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, November 14.

A petition of Andrew Moore, of the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, complaining of an undue election and return of Thomas Lewis, to serve as a member in this House, for the district composed of the counties of Greenbrier, Kenawha, Monroe, Botetourt, and Rockbridge, in the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed, on the twenty-ninth ultimo, "to take into consideration the propriety of reprinting the Laws of the United States, the Journals of the House of Representatives, and other Public Documents," made a report thereon; which was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, one of the members from the State of Vermont, presented to the House certain resolutions of the Legislature of the said State, passed the twenty-fourth of October last, relative to an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in the case of future elections of President and Vice President; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;'" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the tenth instant, to whom was referred the petition of John Hunter; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their agreement to the same, without amendment.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table; and the same being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

"The petition states that Colonel John Fitzgerald, a naval officer in the service of the United States, hired of the petitioner a dwelling-house in the town of Alexandria, and that the property of Fitzgerald had been seized by the United States, 'to satisfy his delinquency.' The petitioner prays that the rent of his dwelling-house, which is in arrears for seven months, may be paid by the Government.

"If the house was hired for the use of the United States, and by one duly authorized for that purpose, the claim may, at any time, be adjusted at the proper department. This, however, is not pretended; nor do your committee know of any principle, either of justice or equity, which would require the Legislature to afford relief to the petitioner. They are, therefore, of opinion, that he have leave to withdraw his petition."

The question was taken, that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said report, and resolved in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, November 15.

Another member to wit: GEORGE TIBBITS, from New York, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a digest of the information received relative to Louisiana, which was read, and, together with the digest of information transmitted therewith, ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, the twenty-seventh of October last, on so much of the President's Message, of the twenty-first of the same month, as relates "to permanent arrangements for the government of Louisiana."

An engrossed bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,'" was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, a Message from the President of the United States, relative to an act of hostility committed on a merchant vessel of the United States by an armed ship or vessel of the Emperor of Morocco, and the copy of a letter from Captain Bainbridge, of the Philadelphia frigate, accompanying the same, have leave to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee last mentioned, presented a bill for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the seventh instant, to whom were referred a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, with sundry accompanying documents, relative to a survey of the harbor in the island of Nantucket, in the State of Massachusetts, and of the bar and shoals near the same; to which Committee of the whole House was also referred a petition of the inhabitants of the island and town of Nantucket, presented the eleventh of February last; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions thereupon, which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the inhabitants of the island and town of Nantucket, in the State of Massachusetts, who presented a petition to this House on the eleventh of February last, have leave to withdraw the said petition, together with the papers accompanying the same.

2. Resolved, That the report of a select committee, made at the last session of Congress, on the subject of the fisheries of the United States, be referred to a select committee, with instruction to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, measures are necessary for the encouragement of the whale and cod fisheries.

Ordered, That Mr. HUGER, Mr. BISHOP, Mr. GRAY, Mr. GODDARD, and Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the second resolution.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House copies of any documents which may be in the possession of the Executive, relative to the arrest and confinement of Zachariah Cox, by the officers in the service of the United States, at Natchez, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight.

Ordered, That Messrs. EARLY and THOMAS M. RANDOLPH be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

WEDNESDAY, November 16.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to examine the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, made a farther report, in part, thereupon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States.

The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, November 17.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the thirty-first ultimo, a motion relative to a provision for relief of the owners of the Danish brigantine Henrick, together with a report of the Secretary of State, communicated by a message to this House from the President of the United States, on the twenty-third of February last, and the accompanying documents, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

Mr. EPPES moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to discontinue the offices of Commissioners of Loans in the different States, and to transfer the duties of those offices to the Secretary of the Treasury, with an allowance of — dollars for additional clerks.

Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned.

The bill leaves the salaries blank.

Mr. LEIB moved the recommitment of the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, under the impression that it had been the intention of the House, in making the original reference to that committee, that they, understanding the resources of the country, should fix the quantum of the salaries, and not report a bill in blank.

Mr. RANDOLPH, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, explained at some length the reasons which had operated with the committee in reporting the bill in blank. He observed that he had himself been in favor of making a report, predicated on the previous decision of the committee, whether the existing salaries should be increased, diminished, or remain unaltered. In this opinion he had been overruled, and the committee, not being able to agree among themselves on these points, had directed a bill in blank to be drawn up.

Mr. NICHOLSON vindicated the report of the committee as perfectly regular, and conformable to the invariable practice in analogous cases. In all cases where a discretion as to the quantum of money applied to specific objects existed, committees had reported a bill in blank, leaving the decision on the proper sums to the determination of the House.

Mr. LEIB's motion to recommit was lost without a division, and the bill referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

PROTECTION TO SEAMEN AND COMMERCE.

An engrossed bill for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States was read the third time.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Massachusetts, rose and said, he wished to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House, in order to introduce an amendment immediately at the end of the first section. He stated that as the clause now stood a power was given to our cruisers to capture the merchant vessels of friendly and allied Powers, having on board goods and effects the property of the Emperor of Morocco or of his subjects.

I will suppose, said Mr. C., that our public ships should meet with a neutral vessel which is suspected to be loaded with enemies' goods, and a capture follows; and it should afterwards appear upon a proper examination in port, that a mistake had been committed, and that the cargo as well as the ship was neutral; I would ask whether the United States would not be held responsible to pay heavy damages; and if an unjust condemnation were to take place, should we not be answerable to the owner of the neutral ship or to his Government?

I have known the flag of our country torn away from the mast, and the fairest documents trampled upon and thrown into the sea by the lawless freebooters of the ocean. I have also, known, and the members of this House cannot be ignorant of the fact, that more than one thousand American merchant vessels were captured during the late war in Europe, and wantonly and unjustly condemned as enemies' property, when every timber belonging to the vessels, and every dollar of the cargoes, were bona fide American. And having seen this I do not wish an authority should be given to our own cruisers, whereby the merchant vessels of an unoffending nation may be captured, and their cargoes afterwards adjudicated. Mr. C. here offered the following amendment to the bill, to be introduced at the termination of the first section:

"Provided nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the capture or detention of any vessel bearing the flag of any European Power whatever, although such vessel may be loaded in whole or in part with goods and effects belonging to the Emperor of Morocco or his subjects—contraband goods destined to the enemies' ports excepted."

After reading the amendment in his place, Mr. C. said that he offered it to the consideration of that honorable body, wishing most sincerely that it should be incorporated into the bill, or that some other provision might be introduced guarding against the practice he had alluded to by the ships of the belligerent nations.

Mr. DANA observed that the alleged objection did not lie against the bill, as the nature of the instructions to commanders of American vessels was confided to the President, who would, no doubt, adopt such regulations as should be proper.

Mr. EUSTIS opposed the recommitment, on the ground that the provisions of the bill were an exact transcript of those contained in an act passed two years since in relation to Tripoli, and on the ground that the insertion of the proposed amendment might, while it failed to affect the principle of the law of nations, produce considerable inconveniences so far as it related to the Barbary Powers.

After some debate, in which Mr. NICHOLSON supported the amendment, upon the principle that free ships ought to make free goods, it was put and lost, 39 members only being in favor of it.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. DANA observed that it had been hitherto usual to require the yeas and nays to be taken to mark the disagreement of the members of the House; he moved that they should be taken on this question to show their cordial agreement.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and carried unanimously in the affirmative—yeas 117, as follows:

POSTAGE OF NEWSPAPERS.

MR. G. W. CAMPBELL.—There is a subject to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. It is, sir, the postage charged on the transportation of newspapers in the mail. This subject I conceive of sufficient importance to meet the attention of this House, as it affects the means of acquiring political information in the different parts of the Union.

I presume it will not be denied, that the most effectual way of rendering the people at large useful citizens, and of securing to them their liberties and independence, would be to increase the sources of information, make them well acquainted with their political rights, and also with the proceedings of their Government. So long as they are informed on those subjects, so long they will be disposed to acquiesce in, and support such measures as may be calculated to promote the general good, but will be prepared to resist any attempts that may be made to infringe their rights by those in power. It is believed that newspapers are the most general and effectual means of disseminating political information among the citizens at large; and it ought therefore to be the object of Government to facilitate their circulation as much as possible. I conceive, sir, the most direct way to attain this object would be to cause them to be transported in the mail free of postage.

The moneys arising from the postage on newspapers cannot certainly be such an object to Government, as would justify the principle of laying a tax on information, or pursuing any measures that would have a tendency to diminish, in the least degree, the means by which it may be acquired. It seems to be admitted by all those who have considered the subject, that the Post Office establishment was never intended as a paramount source of revenue; and therefore we find that the moneys arising therefrom have not generally been taken into the calculation, in the estimates of our finances. The whole amount of the postage on newspapers I believe to be very inconsiderable, as an item of revenue; and a great proportion of it, as I am informed, is given to the deputy postmasters for keeping the accounts of such postage, and for collecting the same: and if information is to be relied upon, many of those deputy postmasters, who are allowed about fifty per cent. on the amount of postage thus collected, are of opinion that the labor of keeping those accounts and of collection, exceeds this compensation; and they would be well satisfied that no such postage existed. If this statement be correct, it will go a great way to prove the measure impolitic.

But perhaps it may be said that the postage to be collected on newspapers, has a tendency to insure their arrival at the places of destination, and the delivery of them to those to whom they are directed. This, upon investigation will, I believe, be found not to be the case. It is made the duty of the postmasters, by law, to forward and deliver newspapers, as well as letters,—they act upon oath, and if a sense of propriety in their conduct, and the obligation of an oath, would not induce them to perform their duty in this respect, it cannot be expected that the paltry emolument accruing to them from their part of one cent, or one and a half cents on each newspaper, would have that effect; and even this sum must be still less relied upon as an inducement, when it is considered, as already stated, that the labor required in keeping accounts for this purpose and in collection, is not in reality compensated by the sum received. In order, therefore, to bring this subject fairly before the House, I move that the House come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the act to establish post-offices and post roads in the United States as charges a postage on the transmission of newspapers ought to be repealed.

Ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, November 18.

Two other members, to wit: JOSEPH BRYAN, and SAMUEL HAMMOND, from Georgia, appeared, presented their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the end of the present year, the following annual compensations, and no other, be and they are hereby granted to the officers herein enumerated respectively, that is to say: To the Secretary of State, $ —; to the Secretary of the Treasury, $ —; to the Secretary of War, $ —; to the Secretary of the Navy, $ —; to the Attorney General, $ —; to the Comptroller of the Treasury, $ —; to the Treasurer, $ —; to the Commissioner of the Revenue, $ —; to the Auditor of the Treasury, $ —; to the Register of the Treasury, $ —; to the Accountant of the War Department, $ —; to the Accountant of the Navy Department,

$ —; to the Postmaster General, $ —; and the Assistant Postmaster General, $ —: which respective sums shall be payable quarter-yearly at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to fill the blank in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State with "five thousand dollars."

Mr. LEIB moved to fill it with "three thousand five hundred dollars." According to the rules of the House, the question was first put on the highest sum.

Mr. SANDFORD said he was not able to ascertain what the existing salaries given to the officers named in the bill were, and was therefore, unprepared to vote on the question. He hoped that some gentleman would state precisely what these salaries were.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH rose to give the gentleman from Kentucky the information he desired. The salaries under the existing law, were as follows: Secretary of State, $5,000; the Secretary of the Treasury, $5,000; the Secretary of War, $4,500; the Secretary of the Navy, $4,500; the Comptroller, $3,500; the Treasurer, $3,000; the Auditor, $3,000; the Register, $2,400; the Attorney General, $3,000; the Accountants of the War and Navy Departments, each $2,000.

These are the salaries, said Mr. R., to which these officers are now entitled, and which they have received from the time of their coming into office; and these are the salaries received by their predecessors when they went out of office. The law under which these salaries are received expires with the present year, and if the law now submitted be not passed, the salaries will be as follows: the Secretary of State, $3,500; the Secretary of the Treasury, $3,500; the Secretary of War, $3,000; the Secretary of the Navy, $3,000; the Comptroller, $2,650; the Auditor, $2,400; the Treasurer, $2,400; the Register, $2,000; the Attorney General, $2,400; the Accountants of the War and Navy Departments, $1,600 each.

Mr. LEIB—The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) has stated that the existing salary of the Secretary of State is the same with that received by his predecessor. If the gentleman means by his predecessor, the gentleman who immediately preceded the present Secretary, he is correct; but if he means all his predecessors, he is incorrect. Under the Government as first organized, the Secretary of State received only $3,500. That office was then filled by a man of the first talents, and the country was also in a critical situation; yet the salary of $3,500 was deemed sufficient. When it was increased, in the year 1799, it was contended that articles of consumption were at war prices, and that the seat of Government being about to be removed to Washington, it was necessary to make an additional provision. Suppose these were facts then, are they so now? Are the articles of living dearer now, than they were before the passage of the act of 1799? they are not dearer in Washington than in Philadelphia; while house rent is dearer there than here. These are reasons why the salaries as they stood at that period should not now be increased. When the act of 1799 was passed, it was urged, by certain gentlemen now in favor of an increase of salaries, that economy in a Republican Government was highly necessary, and that there was a large national debt, the discharge of which required the most frugal disbursement of the public moneys. Now, when a change has taken place in the administration of the Government, and gentlemen possess the power of reducing these salaries, they are in favor of their continuance. Mr. L. hoped they would regard consistency of character, and recollect that if these salaries were wrong then, they could not be right now. He therefore trusted, when they fully considered the circumstances, they would vote in favor of filling the blank with the small sum proposed.

Mr. ALSTON hoped the motion of the gentleman from Virginia would prevail. If gentlemen really wish to make a saving, they will not turn their attention to the trifling difference between the present salaries and those that existed four or five years back; the difference is so small as not to be noticed in the scale of national expenditure. We know, also, that the salaries now received have called forth the first talents. If they shall be reduced, we do not know that those given will call forth the best talents. It therefore appears to me, said Mr. A., extremely probable that the small saving contemplated by some gentlemen will be attended with great eventual loss. With regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LEIB) on the comparative expenses of this place and Philadelphia, I can only judge from my own expenses, which were less in Philadelphia than here.

Mr. LEIB said it was true that boarding was dearer in this city than in Philadelphia; but that arose from the session of Congress being but for part of a year, which obliged those who keep boarding houses to charge enough during a part of the year for them to subsist on during the whole. This was the case with those whose residence was permanent.

Mr. FINDLEY believed that gentlemen were so far agreed with regard to the salaries of permanent offices, as to unite in opinion that there should be attached to them established salaries. As far as he knew the intention of those who were friendly to the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia, the object was to fill the blanks with the same salaries which had been allowed for five years past. This object, therefore, had received the sanction of five years' experience; an experience which, in ordinary concerns, ought not, in his opinion, to be disregarded. In the course of his experience, under either Federal or State Governments, he had not known salaries lowered. Besides, if from time to time, changes be made in the salaries of the officers of Government, it may be said that we are actuated by a spirit of favoritism to particular men.

His colleague (Mr. LIEB) had taken a review of the state of the salaries, and of the comparative expenses of living. To the opinion expressed by him, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ALSTON) had replied. He (Mr. F.) agreed with that gentleman. As far as his experience extended, he found no abatement, but an augmentation of the expenses of living; all the changes that had taken place were in favor of higher living and higher salaries. The necessities of life might be cheaper as far as they depended upon a foreign demand; but we cannot calculate on this as a permanent state of things. The late peace of Europe had been of long duration and war had returned. Nor can we derive any argument for reducing the salaries, from the existing state of the circulating medium. A few years back there was but one bank in Philadelphia, which had but a small capital, now there are three. A similar increase of those institutions has taken place in different parts of the United States. This is proof of a great increase of capital and depreciation of money.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Salaries of certain Officers.

H. OF R.

But gentlemen, desirous of reducing salaries, should look round to other officers than those named in this bill. For his own part, Mr. F. said, he did not know that he had ever voted for lowering the salary of any officer; and when he desired gentlemen to turn their attention to other officers, it was not that he was in favor of reducing their salaries. But he asked gentlemen to look to the collectors of the ports, some of whom received $5,000 a year—a sum equal to the highest allowed, under this bill, to officers where the responsibility incurred and talents required were infinitely greater. With regard to the policy of the measure, he would appeal to gentlemen whether it was politic in the Government of the United States to narrow the field of choice for the selection of these important officers? For his part, he wished the Government might always hold out a temptation to the greatest talents. When he considered the salaries given by the States to their officers, the present salaries did not appear more than a competence. With respect to the motion to fill the blank with $3,500, Mr. F. said he called it lowering the present salaries; and the gentlemen now in office came in under the expectation that the existing salaries would be continued. They had not, it is true, the security of law for their continuance, but they had a well-founded expectation. In Pennsylvania, the salaries of the judges were raised for a time, and then made permanent.

Mr. F. said that he, in 1799, voted against raising these salaries; but now, after the increase had so long existed, and had become fortified by experience, he should be against reducing them, under the impression that the salaries of such officers should be permanent. He therefore hoped that the motion to fill the blank with $5,000 would prevail.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said he did not understand the reasoning adduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LEIB), to show that the blank ought to be filled with a smaller sum than $5,000. There had, indeed, been adduced an argument that might apply with some force to particular gentlemen in that House, but which was inapplicable to a great majority of the members: he alluded to the argument that those who in 1799 voted against an increase of salaries, should at this time vote in favor of a diminution of them. At that period, he had not the honor of a seat in the House. But, if this argument applied with any force to those who voted against an increase, to restrain them from voting for this bill, it ought surely to be more conclusive on the minds of those who on that occasion voted for it, to induce them now not to vote against it. And for this plain reason, the Committee would perceive that the same cause which induced members in 1799 to vote against the increase of salaries, might induce them to vote for their continuance after they were raised. It did not, therefore, follow that there was any inconsistency between opposing the increase in 1799, and voting for its continuance in 1803. There was a wide difference between refusing to augment a salary and refusing to diminish it after it was augmented. For, though there may have been in 1799 strong reasons against an increase, there may be stronger reasons at present entertained by the same men against a diminution. He believed, had he been a member then, he should have voted against the increase. But there would be an obvious and glaring inconsistency in those, who, having voted in 1799 for an increase, should now vote for a diminution of these salaries. He said so, not from an idea that there were in the House any such gentlemen. He was, on the contrary, persuaded those gentlemen had too great a regard to consistency and to character to commit such a glaring inconsistency of conduct.

As this reduction of the salaries of a few of the Executive officers was supported on the ground of economy, Mr. R. said he would take a view of the expenses of the Government, in order to determine whether this object, so much the favorite of some gentlemen, was worthy of the attention bestowed upon it. Of the expenditures of the Government, those usually classed under the name of civil list amounted to $564,000; those of a miscellaneous nature, which in some of the items partook of the character of those which constituted the civil list, $183,000; for foreign intercourse, $159,000; for the Military department, $863,000; for the Naval Establishment, $650,000. These, constituting the whole estimate of the expenses for the ensuing year, fell short of two millions and a half; of which, only about half a million goes to the support of the civil list. What are we now about to do? To legislate at an expense greater than the saving contemplated—to bring a mere pepper-corn into the Treasury—to cut off, perhaps, some of the most responsible officers of the Government. In my opinion, said Mr. R., if a reform of expenses is our object, it belongs to us to begin (where we ought to begin, on some other solemn occasions) at home. Let us look at our own expenses and receipts—at the contingent fund of this House, and of the other branch of the Legislature—at the contingent fund of the departments. We shall find the expenses of the Department of State, exclusive of the expense of printing and distributing the laws, $12,000, while the salary of the Secretary is $5,000; of the Secretary of the Treasury, $9,000, while the salary of the Secretary is $5,000; of the Comptroller's office, $9,000, while the salary is $3,500; of the Auditor, $9,000, while the salary is $3,000; of the Register's office, $14,000, while the salary is $2,400. We shall also find in the same Department other miscellaneous expenses to the large amount of $11,000. We shall find in the War Department the expenses $12,000, of which $4,500 constitutes the salary of the Secretary; and in the Accountant's office, $10,000 expenses, while the salary is $2,000, besides the expenses of the Paymaster and Purveyor of Public Supplies. We shall find in the Navy Department the expenses $6,000, and the salary of the Secretary $4,500; and in the Accountant's office the expenses $8,000, and the salary $2,000. In the Post Office Department we shall find the same ratio between the expenses and the salary of the head of the Department. Then come the expenses of the officers of the Commissioners of Loans in the several States, properly the expenses of the Treasury Department, and which are immense. Then follows that glorious institution—that splendid attribute of sovereignty—the Mint, for which the Government annually pays $11,600 in salaries to its officers, exclusive of other expenses, amounting to $9,400, and making altogether the enormous sum of $20,000! Then follows the Judiciary, respecting the expenses of which I have no further observations to make, than that I believe the salaries of the men who fill those high and responsible offices are very inferior to what they ought to be. Then follows that description of expense, which I have always understood to be the peculiar fund from which a nation may economize—the Marine and War Departments; one of which amounts to $860,000, and the other to $650,000. They are the departments in which a nation can alone exercise true economy. When I make this observation, I do not mean to say that reform ought not to take place in the civil expenditures; but even then we ought to strike at the contingent funds—the stationery and fuel of the Departments, and of this and the other House.

It has been stated truly by the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY,) that it is not sound policy to narrow the range of the choice for the great Executive officers of the United States. I believe it will be narrowed by the proposed diminution of their salaries. On this subject, I speak without any understanding with the gentlemen who at present hold those offices. I believe that inducements other than pecuniary brought those gentlemen into office; and I also believe, that if this blank shall be filled with $3,500, it will be impossible to get men to hold these offices from pecuniary considerations. We know the fact that no man of talents, devoted to the liberal professions, fails to get a large sum. Of course it follows that men who hold these offices cannot be actuated by such motives. No, it is to an attachment to certain political opinions—to particular men—to the love of glory inherent in every noble breast—that we are to look for the true motives; and these, I believe, are the motives that would induce the men who at present hold these high offices still to hold them, if the compensation were reduced to a single cent. But whether these are motives which can or ought to induce a man to become a public servant, will you induce such a man to sacrifice his patrimony, or abandon his office, unless fortune has been so kind as to make the sum he is necessarily called upon to expend, to him, a trifling consideration? Is this policy—is it Republicanism—that no man, unless of overgrown fortune, should be able to hold a high Executive office in a fair way? I know there is an abundance of hunters and bidders for offices, who are ready to take them on any terms; but these are not the men with which these important and dignified offices ought to be filled. There is not a doubt, if you put the office of the Secretary of State up at auction, you will get men who will undertake to execute its important functions at the sum proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but in this way, for a saving of $1,500, we may lose millions.

I beg gentlemen to attend to the nature and extent of the duties of the great offices of the Department of State and of the Treasury. I speak without reference to those who at present hold them, though I might speak with reference to them. Do not those stations require an unblemished character, the highest talents, and an unwearied assiduity to discharge their duties with benefit to the nation; and can you expect such men to accept such offices for the small sum of $3,500 a year, if influenced by pecuniary considerations? While gentlemen are for detracting from the little which these great officers possess, we find that collectors, and supervisors, and other officers whose duties are merely ministerial, and which require only ordinary talents, are drawing from the Treasury to the amount of $5,000 a year; and until a late law passed drew from $5,000 to $12,000; and these men, according to the ideas of some gentlemen, are to retain their $5,000, while the Secretary of State and of the Treasury are only to receive $3,500.

I well know that when the act establishing the salaries as they now stand passed, it was a subject of clamor; but it was a clamor that never reached me; I mean one by which I was not affected. For I have always believed, in public as well as in private life, it is sound policy to obtain the best agents, to give them enough to do, and to pay them well for their services. I believe that in a single negotiation conducted by a Secretary of State, millions may depend upon the exercise of the discretionary power with which he is clothed. It may depend upon his answer to a foreign Minister, whether we shall have peace or war. There is also a vast responsibility attached to the Secretary of the Treasury; and though the scope of his duties may be less extensive than those of the Secretary of State, yet millions may be won or lost by the manner in which he discharges them. There are other officers whose compensations are fixed by this bill, called upon to discharge high duties, on the proper execution of which much depends.

It may be said, for all these things the President is responsible; that he is, or ought to be a man of the first talents, and that the heads of the Departments cannot go amiss without his sanctioning their measures. It has, however, always appeared to me that every form of Government that devolves the whole Executive power on a single individual, differs but in form from that which devolves it upon a plurality of persons. It is the essence of Government that one man cannot execute it alone; and that he is obliged to share it with heads of Departments, or with agents by some other name. The imbecility of human nature is such that he must participate power with others. It is the nature of the human race not to possess confidence in themselves, to take advice, and of consequence to be influenced by others in whom they repose confidence. Whatever, therefore, the theory of the Government may be, the acts of the Government must take their color more or less from the advisers of the heads of the Executive power; and hence the necessity of those advisers being men of wisdom and of the purest character. Such men ought to receive a compensation that will render them independent; for it is in the middling ranks, neither among the rich nor the poor, that such characters abound.

As I have before remarked, I know when the last act on this subject passed there was a clamor; a clamor on one point, and then on another. But what effect had it on the nation? Let us inquire of the people, whether, while the affairs of the nation are so prosperously managed, they are not content to give a fair compensation? We only ask that those, to whom the country eminently owes its peace and prosperity, may be enabled to support with comfort themselves and their families. Let us suppose that those who manage the public concerns had acted indiscreetly; that, instead of preserving us in peace and paying off with great rapidity the public debt, they had produced a state of war, and had saddled the people with additional and heavy impositions. If they, in such circumstances, should ask for salaries and argue that the articles of life are at war prices, I would have them answered: no, gentlemen, you have brought us into war wisely or unwisely, no matter which; it calls for sacrifices; begin at home; you have laid new taxes upon the poor and the rich; live then yourselves upon small salaries, and set an example to the people by being the first to make some personal sacrifices yourselves. I say so to the House. I cannot enter into a comparison of the price of wheat and bread, and other articles of necessity or comfort. I cannot huckster with such men as fill the great offices of Government; and go to them and say whatever your talents, or whatever the services you render your country, you may live on leeks and onions—no, sir, I cannot stoop to this conduct. If on my return home, I should have to tell my constituents, we have reduced the salaries of the heads of the departments, small as they were, to save the public money; but we have made sacrifices at the expense of others—were I obliged thus to address my constituents on my return to them, I should not be able to find language for the occasion. I should blush to tell them, that for my poor insignificant services as a member of this House, I had demanded what would carry me through the session without debt, while I had screwed from men so superior to me in every respect, the small pittance rendered them as an inadequate compensation for their great services. I should blush to be obliged to tell them so. I cannot go home and address them in this language.

Mr. CHITTENDEN—Mr. Chairman, I rise with extreme diffidence when I consider the talent and experience of gentlemen who compose this honorable House, being unaccustomed to take an active part in public debate. It is a sense of duty and not a matter of vanity which induces me to rise on this occasion. Therefore, without attempting to court praise on the one hand, or fearing censure on the other, I shall, neglectful of both, deliver my opinion on this interesting subject, hoping it will be received with the same candor it is given. The filling the blanks in this bill, or determining the salaries of the officers of Government to be provided for by it, is not a question simply between this House and the persons now holding the offices, but, sir, it is a question in which every individual in society is more or less interested. It is, what the Government ought to allow their public agents or servants as a compensation for their services rendered in their several departments? And sir, permit me to say, I think it a question which this House, as the more immediate representatives and guardians of the rights and interests of the people, ought to decide upon the true principles of honor, justice, sound policy, and strict economy, without reference to particular men or parties, as the bill under consideration has for its object the permanent establishment of those salaries. We ought not to combat with the weapons of passion or prejudice, both of which are known to be the vices of the mind, and unsupported by virtue, justice or honor. The prevailing policy of absolute Governments has ever been to enrich their favorite few at the expense of the nation.

But God forbid that this policy should ever prevail in a Government like ours, the very existence of which, in my opinion, depends on the honor and virtue with which our public officers are selected, and the justice and economy with which they are compensated. The office of Secretary of State is an office of trust and high responsibility, and it requires a person of the first talents to perform its duties with ability and safety to the nation. Those men have been found, who, (to their honor may it ever be said,) have discharged the duties of this office with reputation to themselves and in a manner highly conducive to the prosperity of their country, and for a compensation $1,500 less than the sum now proposed, until March, 1799, when from a combination of circumstances then existing the advanced prices of almost every article of living, in consequence of the European war, and the inconvenience of the removal of the public offices to the permanent seat of Government, the salaries of certain officers contemplated in the bill on your table were augmented, and by an act passed by Congress in the year 1800 have been continued until this time, which act will soon expire, and the salaries remain as they were previous to March 1799. The reasons, sir, which induced the Legislature to pass the bill augmenting those salaries having ceased, and gentlemen in favor of the motion not having been able to offer others which appear to me sufficient, I can see no good reason why at this time we should by a permanent law establish those salaries at the advanced sum now proposed. It is well known that the passing the act augmenting the salaries was a subject of very considerable alarm, and has been made a step-stone to power and preferment by gentlemen, some of whom are now enjoying the benefits arising from the augmentation of those very salaries with perfect satisfaction; and from whom at this time and on this occasion we hear no cry either in favor of economy or against high salaries. An honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. ALSTON,) expressed his fears that we shall not be able to retain the gentlemen who now fill those offices, nor find others of equal talents willing to accept of the appointment, unless the blank should be filled with the round sum of $5,000. But, sir, experience teaches us otherwise. It has been very candidly acknowledged, even by gentlemen of the same political sentiments with himself (and I think very much to their honor) in the course of the present debate, that those offices were formerly filled by gentlemen whose talents and integrity were unquestionable, and for a compensation $1,500 lower than the sum now proposed, and at a time when the means of living were equally as high, if not higher than they now are.

An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FINDLEY) informs us that, in the course of his long experience, both in this House and in the State Legislature, he has never known a single instance of the salary of any officer being reduced, but often raised. If, sir, any conclusion can be drawn from this statement, it is, in my mind, a sufficient reason why the progress of this prevailing evil ought now to be arrested.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia, last up, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH,) with his usual eloquence, has said much in favor of the talents and discretion of the gentlemen who now fill the public offices—placing the value of their services almost out of the reach of calculation. I, sir, have no disposition to detract from the merit of those gentlemen in the least, neither am I disposed to be lavish of the public money on this occasion; for, from the gentleman's own statement, we are unable to compensate them in proportion to their talents and services. I shall therefore be satisfied with giving them a compensation which I deem adequate to the performance of the ordinary duties of the offices to which they belong. The difference between the present permanent salaries and those contemplated by this bill being something short of $12,000, the gentleman thinks it a trifling sum—a mere pepper-corn saving; and he says, if our intention is to make a reduction in the expenses of our Government, there are many other objects which he has enumerated, and from which, in his opinion, a saving might with much more propriety be made. This is a subject worthy of consideration; and, from the gentleman's own showing, I am clearly convinced that this is the proper time to make a stand—a powerful stand, give me leave to say, sir—against every abuse of this kind. And if the gentleman will come forward, I pledge myself that I will join him in examining into, and preventing every improper expenditure of the public money. For, although it may be the opinion of some gentlemen that eleven or twelve thousand dollars is a trifling saving, still I am of a different opinion; and, sir, I am induced to believe that the honest industrious farmer and mechanic, who are accustomed to labor in their own fields and shops—and of this description are a very large and respectable portion of our fellow-citizens—will not consider eleven or twelve thousand dollars an inconsiderable or pepper-corn saving, as the gentleman is pleased to consider it. And, sir, although I am decidedly in favor of allowing a reasonable and adequate compensation to every officer of Government, yet, when we compare the sum of five thousand dollars per annum with the salaries of any of the State officers, and particularly the State which I have the honor to represent, the highest of which does not exceed seven hundred and fifty dollars; or should we compare it with the salaries of the other officers of the General Government, I think the sum proposed must appear too high, or the others comparatively too low. The compensation allowed the Supreme Court of the United States is but four thousand dollars to the chief judge, and to the associate judges three thousand five hundred dollars each. And it must be allowed, that, to fill these offices, it requires men of the first talents and information, who, to discharge the various duties of their offices, are obliged to travel through the different parts of the Union, at very considerable expense, while the Secretary of State and other heads of Departments are at home, enjoying the society of their families and friends. Thus, sir, in every point of view in which this subject has been considered, I am induced to believe the sum proposed too high, and therefore shall give my vote against the motion for filling the blank with the sum of five thousand dollars.

Mr. J. CLAY.—As this subject is one which will probably occasion considerable difference of opinion in the Committee, it is a duty which I owe to myself and to my constituents, to state, in a few words, the reasons which induce me to vote against filling the blank with the larger sum named. I perfectly agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in the general opinions he has expressed. I believe, that, unless sufficient inducements are held out to men of talents to accept the first offices, the Government will go to ruin; and I agree that those who hold them are men of talents and virtue. With them it has been my pride to agree in political sentiment, and it has been my duty on several occasions to justify and support their measures. On personal considerations, therefore, I should be the last man on this floor to vote for a diminution of the salaries at present attached to these offices.

The ideas of the gentleman from Virginia are such as, it appears to me, would favor any salary, however extravagant, given to these officers. He has not attempted to show that the salaries allowed before the year 1799 were too low. He has objected to some items in the expenses of the Government that certainly militate against the ground he has taken. He has stated that the expenses of clerk-hire and the contingent funds of the Departments are extravagant. Now, the number of the clerks and the direction of the contingent fund depend on the mere will of those who hold these offices. The gentleman gives them great credit for their savings. If it be necessary to save in the clerk-hire and contingent funds of these Departments, why have not these saving gentlemen made the necessary savings? The gentleman has alluded to the nature of the offices under the Government of the United States. They may be considered as of three kinds; such as are menial, and deprive the individuals who hold them of some estimation in society; others that, while they take no honor away, confer none; and others, which give honor to those who hold them. Of the first description, are the offices of clerks, which require a species of talent, and equal integrity with that required for the head of a Department: but there is no acquisition of honor, while there is a sacrifice of personal independence. The second description, in general consists of fee offices, the emoluments of which depend upon contingencies subject to the control of circumstances. They may amount to, but never can exceed, a certain sum. As to the last kind of offices, which confer honor on those who hold them, I believe with the gentleman from Virginia, that, unless there are other motives besides those which are pecuniary, to induce men of talents and virtue to accept them, five thousand dollars will be but a paltry consideration. But if we attend to the nature of these offices, we shall perceive that there are other inducements, such as, to use the phrase of the gentleman, "All noble souls feel the love of glory." But, reducing these motives to mere pecuniary ones, I will ask if three thousand five hundred dollars will not purchase a man of talents and integrity, will the additional sum of fifteen hundred dollars? I believe not.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Salaries of certain Officers.

The gentleman says, we cannot go home, and say to our constituents, while we have reduced the salaries of these offices to the state at which they originally stood, we have not reduced our own. I believe that, in this point of view, those who represent on this floor the seats of commerce, sacrifice more by holding seats in this House than officers who receive an annual compensation. I will ask if the man, whose eye is usually on his own affairs, does not, by a six months' absence every year, sacrifice more than he whose property is vested in a farm, and who receives a handsome salary at the seat of Government? I believe the amount of a member's wages is about eight hundred dollars a year. A clerk, therefore, receives double the sum that is paid to a Representative of the people. The gentleman from Virginia has enumerated other articles of expense as fit subjects for reduction. If the gentleman is willing to enter into a full review of the expenses of the several offices of the Government, from that of the President to the lowest clerk, and to reduce them from profusion to economy, I am willing to unite with him hand in hand. But this is not the subject at present before the House. As connected with the subject, I should have been glad to have heard any reasons why the salaries, allowed to these officers, were adequate in 1799, and are inadequate now. The gentleman says that he cannot go into detail; that he is unwilling to huckster with the gentlemen who hold these offices. If a vote of this House is to be determined by any epithet which a gentleman may think fit to appropriate to a particular act, we had better rise at once, and trust to chance—for anything may be called huckstering.

I have reasons, which operate with force on my mind, for filling this blank with three thousand five hundred dollars. There exists on this subject a great degree of clamor. How raised, is one thing; that it exists, is another. I consider this clamor as the loud voice of the people. I know that advantages are taken to render the measures of the present Administration odious. I am unwilling, therefore, to give to the enemies of the Administration any advantages that may return to them the sceptre of power which has been recently stricken from their grasp. Believing that the giving large salaries will surely have this effect; believing that the people of the State I have the honor to represent expect a reduction of the existing salaries; believing that a failure to reduce them will produce great clamor among the people, and that such clamor will be just, I shall vote in favor of filling the blank with the smallest sum proposed.

Mr. SANDFORD said the information imparted by the gentleman from Virginia had enabled him to give a correct vote on this subject; before he did which he should trouble the House with a few observations. His ill state of health had not permitted him to attend to the progress of the bill before the Committee, and when he before rose he was new to the subject. But, from the remarks which had dropped from different gentlemen in the course of this debate, he had found no reasons that satisfied his mind of the propriety of a reduction of the salaries of the officers contemplated in this bill. He, on the contrary, believed those salaries were at present full low enough. It was a maxim with him, unless good reasons were offered for the reduction of salaries, to be in favor of continuing them; and no such reasons had he heard. It had been stated by a gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLAY) that the wages of a member of that House amounted only to about the rate of $800 a year: that statement was incorrect; calculating for the year at the rate per diem they would amount to about $2,100 a year, and in the case of members, living remote from the seat of Government, to about $2,500. He would ask the House to recollect the difference between his services, and those of a head of a Department; and yet he received more than half of the compensation made to the highest officers under the Government, excepting the President and Vice President. Mr. S. said he was clearly of opinion, for these and other reasons, that the salaries should continue to stand as they then did.

Mr. SKINNER rose, and made some preliminary remarks, not distinctly heard. He then said, his opinion was that this place was more expensive than any within the United States. Comparing the expenses here with those in the east wing of the continent, they bore no proportion. Gentlemen say these are war salaries; and is there not now a state of war in Europe? Would it then be wise, when these salaries were formed under circumstances arising out of war, to reduce them at the commencement of another war, before its effects are known? He drew, in his mind, a distinction between increasing salaries, and continuing them after such increase. At the time these salaries were increased, it had been stated as a reason for the increase that we were about removing the seat of Government to this place; but he believed it had been opposed on this ground, that it would be best to wait until the Government was removed, when, being here, the necessary expenses could be better ascertained.

Much has been said of economy. Mr. SKINNER said he had never been for fixing the compensation of officers so low as not to admit the highest talents. True economy, in his opinion, consisted in saving unnecessary expenses; and this would be effected by filling the first offices of the Government with the best men in the Union. Let it be recollected too that these officers have been arraigned before the public until the weapons of slander had broken harmless at their feet. Was this a time to reduce their compensations? Such a measure would surely be most indiscreet, as it might produce an impression of demerit on their part. It would also be an act of ingratitude to the people. Mr. SKINNER stated his belief, that, so far as related to his constituents, the present salaries were deemed no greater than the officers merited, and not more than sufficient to support them. He said he was against continuing useless systems that involved expense, but should be one of the last to reduce the salary annexed to an office of the first importance. He had never been in the habit of contemplating a reduction of these salaries, or of relying upon the patriotism of officers. He believed the best way was to give salaries to the public officers that would enable them to live comfortably. Suppose the patriotism of the gentlemen now in office should not induce them to continue in place at reduced compensations, would we be able to select men of the first talents to supply the vacancy? He did not believe they would. He should, therefore, vote for the highest sum.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with $5,000, and carried—yeas 78.

On motion of Mr. J. Randolph the blank respecting the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury was filled with $5,000.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH then moved to fill the blank respecting the salary of the Secretary of War with $4,500, which was carried—yeas 75, as was a similar motion respecting the Secretary of the Navy with the same sum.

On a motion to fill the blank respecting the Attorney General with $3,000, Mr. J. CLAY asked for information; the reasons in favor of the salaries allowed to the other officers, did not, in his opinion, hold good in this case. He moved to fill the blank with $2,000.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks for information, and professes ignorance of the duties of the Attorney General. I believe those duties are prescribed by law. As to his compensation, the first act, passed under this Government, gave him $1,500. In 1792, $400 were added; and in 1797, $500 more were added, making in the whole $2,400. By the act of March, 1799, this salary, with the others, was raised to $3,000. It appears to me that these progressive additions made to the original salary of this officer, furnish proof that it has heretofore been too low. The gentleman proposes to make the salary $2,000, when, before the passage of the act of March, 1799, it was $2,400. In my turn, let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and it is the first inquiry I have made of him—his reasons for reducing this salary below that fixed previously to 1799? I understand him as willing to put the salaries generally on the same footing on which they stood before the passage of the act of 1779. This salary was then 2,400 dollars; it then was increased with the rest, and having been increased proportionably with them is a reason with me that it is not exorbitant and does not require diminution. I have no other reason to offer. The gentleman asks if the important officers at the head of the State and Treasury Departments receive only $5,000, why we give $3,000 to an inferior officer? For the plainest reason on earth. We must give him a salary that will enable him to live in a comfortable manner. I agree with the gentleman, if we were to remunerate our officers in the ratio of their merits, and were to give the Comptroller $3,000, we ought to give to the head of the Department at least $50,000. I speak as to the offices, not as to the men that fill them. But this is impossible. It is, however, proper that every man should live in some style; however we may reason on this point, the feelings of men will decide it. This is my reason for giving the Attorney General $3,000. If I am asked, why give our Clerk $2,000, or his chief clerk $1,300, I have no other reason. There is no doubt, if we give our Doorkeeper $800, $5,000 is not competent to the Secretary of State; but it is necessary, nevertheless, to give our Doorkeeper enough to live on, that we may insure his daily faithful services.

While I am up, I will take the opportunity of making an explanation, which will show how far I have been misunderstood by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I did not state, as represented by him, that the contingent expenses of the Departments were profuse, or that any reform could be made in them. But I went over the list to show that, if the object of gentlemen really was to make a saving of the public money, it was in them that it was to be made, and not in the salaries of particular officers. I stated that, in the Department of the Treasury, whose whole expenses are $100,000, it was idle to attempt an economical reform, by curtailing a few salaries. I could not have stated that I considered the Departments conducted with profusion, for I do not believe it.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Salaries of certain Officers.

H OF R.

I also stated that gentlemen who wished to save money should resort to the Marine and Military departments, and that they were the two great sinks of nations; but I did not state that they were the sinks of this nation. Did the gentleman ever hear of a nation ruined by its civil list? I do not, however, mean to say that abuses should be tolerated in the civil list, but that in great pecuniary reforms, we ought to begin with the marine, the army, diplomatic expenses, and then come to the civil list—thus embracing a full inquiry into the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SKINNER said he was for continuing the salaries as they stood. If he were disposed at all to alter them, he should be in favor of raising that of the Attorney General. The reason at first assigned for the smallness of the salary of this officer was, the residence of the Government at a commercial city, where he could discharge the duties of his office without sacrificing his professional pursuits. This reason had ceased.

Mr. J. CLAY merely rose to answer one question of the gentleman from Virginia, who had asked why he was in favor of reducing this salary? Simply because the services rendered by the officer were more than adequately compensated.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was mistaken in saying that the Attorney General was more than compensated for his services. Mr. N. could not say, with precision, what those services were. But he knew that there was scarcely a law in relation to the revenue that did not come under the view of this officer for his advice and opinion. He knew that he was frequently called upon by the heads of the Departments for his opinion of the construction of laws. He was also a member of the Cabinet, and was bound to give an opinion, in writing, to the President, whenever required. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary that this officer should be a man of the first talents and integrity. Mr. N. was of opinion that he ought to be a man of equal talents and integrity with those at the head of the Departments. Not, however, being obliged to relinquish all professional pursuits, it was not necessary that he should have an equal salary with them.

For some time it had been the practice of the Government to compensate the Attorney General for extra services. For such services, performed under the British Treaty, he had been allowed $600. His salary, with this additional compensation, had never been heretofore considered as more than sufficient. It was true that his duties were not so arduous as those of the heads of the State and Treasury Departments, but they require equal talents and integrity; and if the officer should be brought from a distance, he ought to be enabled to live comfortably.

Mr. GODDARD asked if the $600 alluded to by the gentleman from Maryland, did not make part of the salary of $3,000 given the Attorney General, although the services for which the $600 were allowed were at an end?

Mr. NICHOLSON replied that the gentleman was mistaken. The Attorney General had received $2,600 since the year 1799, when the salary was raised to $3,000.

Mr. GODDARD said he considered the augmentation of the salary from $2,400 to $3,000 as having arisen from the temporary duties of that officer, which augmentation was made by a temporary law.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—By an act passed in 1797, an additional compensation of $600 was allowed this officer. In 1799, his salary was fixed at $3,000. He accordingly received thereafter $3,600 until his temporary duties under the English Convention were completed.

The question to fill the blank with $3,000 was then carried in the affirmative—yeas 59, nays 30.

It was then agreed, without a division, to fill the several other blanks with the same sums allowed by the act of March, 1799, to the Comptroller, the Treasurer, the Auditor, the Register, and the Accountants of the War and Navy Departments.

On filling the blank respecting the Postmaster General, Mr. LYON moved to fill it with $3,500.

Lost, without a division.

It was then agreed to fill it with $3,000, and that respecting the Assistant Postmaster General with $1,700.

Mr. EUSTIS moved an amendment to the first section, so as to make it read "that, from the end of the present year, the following annual compensations, as established by an act passed on the 2d of March, 1799," &c.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. LOWNDES and GODDARD.

Carried—yeas 65, nays 43.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, with amendments, which the House immediately took up.

On the question to agree to the first amendment, (that moved, as above, by Mr. EUSTIS.) Mr. J. CLAY hoped it would not be agreed to. As it decided the principle of the bill, he called for the yeas and nays; which, being taken, were—yeas 69, nays 46, as follows:

MONDAY, November 21.

Two other members, to wit: SIMON BALDWIN and BENJAMIN TALLMADGE, from Connecticut, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from Kenawha county, in the State of Virginia, respecting the contested election of THOMAS LEWIS, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

The bill fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned, was read the third time, and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"—

Mr. TAGGART said:—I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of stating some reasons for the vote which it is probable I shall give on the passing of the bill now before the House. I feel no hostility to the principle of the bill in general. I am not certain that any of the specific sums contemplated as salaries are too high. With the official duties of several of the Departments I am unacquainted, and therefore consider myself as not being a competent judge. With respect to some of them, however, when we bring into view the great importance of the trust to the United States, the high responsibility of the respective officers, and the talents necessary for the prompt discharge of the duties, I am persuaded the salaries are not too high. This I view to be particularly the case with the Secretaries of State and of the Treasury. I believe, sir, that where an office is of such high trust and responsibility as to require men of the first characters for talents and integrity to fill it, it is the truest economy for Government to give such encouragement as shall be adequate to the calling forth of those talents. Though the time has been in our country (and possibly may again arrive) when there was a loud call upon the patriotism of individuals to make important sacrifices, both of their own property and ease, for the public good, yet in a time of profound peace and national prosperity—when we are blessed with a regular Government—a productive revenue, and a full Treasury, adequate to all necessary expenses—for a man to abandon the superintendence of his domestic concerns, and, for a great proportion of his time, the comforts of domestic life, and, as is frequently the case, the emoluments of a lucrative profession, and embark in the public service without an adequate compensation, is a species of sacrifice which the public has no right to expect from individuals. I make no doubt but the highest departments of State may be filled for a less sum than the one contemplated in this bill. But to starve the Departments by rendering the salaries inadequate to the calling forth the first talents of the nation, is the way to have them either filled with men unequal to the trust, or to force worthy men, who have it at their option to follow other honorable and lucrative employments, frequently to abandon the public service, thereby exposing the Department to such frequent changes and resignations as must be highly injurious to the public. By saving in this way three or four thousand dollars, we may run the hazard of losing millions, by having the business pass into inexperienced and unskilful hands, while, had an adequate compensation been allowed, the man of real talents and integrity would have felt an honest pride in continuing in the public service, and discharging the duties of his office with promptness and fidelity. Some have in this House spoken warmly of the merits of the gentlemen who fill the respective Departments. I have no disposition to detract from their merits. But I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a principle which ought to have the least influence in fixing the quantum of salaries for the several Departments, and I trust is not the motive with any gentleman on this floor. Perhaps these Departments never have been and never will be filled by men for whom every member of this House has an equal esteem. Perhaps there never, either, was or will be a time when, if the members of this House were to consult their own feelings of personal attachment, they would not, some of them, at least, be led to make a discrimination in the several heads of Departments. But the feelings of private esteem and friendship ought, in my opinion, to have no influence whatever in fixing the quantum of salaries. The only principles by which, as I apprehend, the House ought to be governed in making the specific appropriation, are the importance of the office itself to the United States, the responsibility of the respective officers, and the talents necessary for the discharge of their high trust. In this view of the subject, I do not know that the salaries are too high, and shall not oppose the passing of the bill now before the House. But to the passing of the bill in its present form I shall have objections, arising chiefly from the amendment introduced by my colleague from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS.) Having formed a high opinion of the candor, and having been several times witness to the accuracy of that gentleman upon the floor of this House, conjecture has been busy in inquiring what could possibly be his motive for introducing, and what possible advantages the bill could receive by being encumbered with the above amendment? If the bill cannot stand on the footing of its own intrinsic merits, it ought to be abandoned. Why, then, shall we attempt in an indirect way to prop it? For myself, I can conjecture only two reasons for which a clause of this kind should be introduced. Either it must be adapted to the circumstances of those who were members of this House when the law of 1799 was passed, and who opposed the enacting of that law, to come forward in an indirect manner and practically own that their opposition to that law was wrong. If this is meant, I can certainly have no objection to gentlemen confessing an error, though the confession should be made in an indirect manner. I conclude, however, that this is not the intention; therefore, does not the language of the amendment, apparently, at least, amount to this? We have a secret conviction that the law in question is not quite right, but we do not wish to disoblige our friends by lowering the salaries, and we do no more than the majority of both Houses did in 1799, to oblige their friends; and in order to show that we do no worse, we will allude to that law, and make it the basis of the present, thereby making it the scapegoat to bear our transgressions. But should this be intended, I think it will by no means answer the purpose. Reformation, particularly with regard to salaries as well as other expenses, was what was called for and expected. It will not satisfy that expectation to say we have done no worse than the Congress of 1799. As I had not at that time the honor to be a member of this House, and consequently can have no confession to make; and as I feel a willingness that the law should stand upon the footing of its own intrinsic merits, independent of the law of 1799, which has already once died a natural death, and after being again revived is upon the point of expiring, I feel opposed to this amendment. But, Mr. Speaker, I have still a farther objection to it. By means of this amendment, the bill, which was before sufficiently plain to the meanest capacity, becomes perplexed, and apparently, at least, at variance with itself. The bill now before the House proposes to fix the salaries of these officers. It was only a temporary grant for three years. I do not understand that any permanent law was ever made for fixing the salaries of these officers, only the law of 1789, which fixed the salaries of the two Secretaries of State and of the Treasury at $3,500 each, and the others in proportion. The object of the present bill is to fix permanent salaries. But professedly to fix these upon the principles of a law which did not fix, and never was intended to fix them, appears to me to render the bill completely inconsistent with itself. I humbly conceive, therefore, that the amendment introduced by my colleague from Massachusetts is not only needless, but tends to destroy the force and consistency of the bill itself; and for these reasons, though not opposed to the general principles of the bill, I cannot, in its present form, give it my vote.

MR. HASTINGS.—Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who are willing to allow to every public officer a reasonable, just, and honorable compensation for his services. I am for annexing to the great and important offices of our Government such salaries as shall be sufficient to induce persons of suitable and proper talents to fill them. I am not disposed to pay our public officers grudgingly for their labors; but I think the salaries we propose by this bill to grant are too high.

By the law of 1789, the salaries of Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury were each fixed at $3,500, and the salary of the Secretary of War at $3,000; I would ask if those salaries did not then command the first talents of the country? Was not Mr. Jefferson the first Secretary of State under the present Government? And did he resign that office because the compensation was insufficient? I believe not. I have never understood that this was the cause of his resignation. As to the first Secretary of the Treasury, (General Hamilton,) when we consider his great professional talents as a lawyer, and the great profits he might have made by the exercise of those talents, (probably to three or four times the amount of his salary as head of the Treasury Department,) we cannot, I think, be surprised at his resignation; it must be more a matter of surprise that he should have ever accepted of the office; or, after having accepted it, that he should have continued in it so long as he did. Did the first Secretary of War (General Knox) resign because his salary was insufficient? I have never understood that to have been his reason for resigning. But admitting that the insufficiency of salaries was the only reason which induced those gentlemen to resign their offices, I then ask, was there any difficulty in finding persons of suitable talent to fill those offices for the same compensations allowed to their predecessors? This, I believe, will not be pretended. What, then, were the reasons for augmenting the salaries of those officers in 1799? The reasons have been stated in the course of the debate—a war had been raging in Europe for four or five years, and one of the effects of that war upon this country was to advance the price of provisions and most of the necessities of life beyond what perhaps had ever before been known in this country. Flour at that time, we are told, was sold for fifteen and sixteen dollars a barrel, which is now selling for six and seven dollars. House rents, we are also told, were much higher at that time in Philadelphia than at the present time. These are some of the reasons which I presume then induced the National Legislature to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government for a limited time only; the inquiry then is, have the causes which gave rise to the temporary augmentation of salaries in 1799 ceased to exist? If they have, ought not the effect also to cease? I would ask, if it costs the heads of Departments as much to live in this city now as it did in Philadelphia in 1799? Are house rents as high, or have they ever been as high in this city as in Philadelphia? I apprehend it will not be pretended that this now is or ever has been the case. I have been informed that house rents in most parts of this city, except just in the neighborhood of the Capitol, have (within twelve or eighteen months past) fallen forty or fifty per cent., and that within the same time rents for houses the nearest to the Capitol have fallen from twenty to twenty-five per cent. Are provisions as high now in this city, or in Philadelphia, or in any part of the country, as they were in 1799? Is flour now selling for fifteen or sixteen dollars a barrel, and other articles of produce and of the first necessity, in the same proportion? Are the heads of Departments, whose salaries we now propose to augment, in a situation which obliges them to receive and entertain more company in this city than in Philadelphia? At a time, then, when the prices of house rent, of provisions, and many articles of the first necessity, are reduced from what they were in 1799, some of them probably to nearly their standard prices in 1789, yet in these times of economy, when the cry is to save the public money, we are about to give an instance of our love of economy, by increasing the salaries of certain officers of our Government.

One of my colleagues has assigned as one of his reasons for the proposed augmentation of salaries, that a war had recommenced in Europe, and that this war may produce the same effects in this country, in raising the price of produce and articles of the first necessity, which the last war produced. But will it not be prudent and proper for us to wait and know whether the same effects are produced by the present European war, before we undertake to increase salaries? Although my colleague does not now consider the proposed salaries to be too high, yet I find that in 1799, when house rent and provisions, I apprehend, were much higher than they now are, he voted against the temporary augmentation of salaries—against those salaries which it is now the object of this bill permanently to establish. He says, also, that he has not heard any complaints against salaries in that part of Massachusetts in which he lives. No doubt my colleague is correct; but compare the salaries proposed to be increased by this bill with the salaries of other persons in the Government, with the pay of members of Congress, with the salaries of the highest State officers, and they appear to be enormously high. In Massachusetts the Governor has a yearly salary of $2,666 66. The Judges of the Supreme Court, who, in holding courts in the several circuits, are obliged to be absent from their families half the year or more, have each a permanent yearly salary something short, I believe, of $1,200, except the Chief Justice, who has something more than that sum; the Treasurer, Secretary of the State, and Attorney General, each permanent salaries, I think, of $1,000; and yet I have never understood that there has been any difficulty in Massachusetts in procuring suitable and proper persons to fill those important offices. I believe, however, that for a few years past some temporary grants have been made by the State to those officers (excepting the Governor) in addition to their fixed salaries.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

The bill before the House is intended to increase and make permanent the salaries of the officers therein mentioned—the law of 1798 was only temporary. By that law the salaries of certain officers were increased for special and sufficient reasons, which then existed; but now, when those reasons, or many of them, no longer exist, we are about to augment salaries and render permanent those which were only limited and temporary.

Considering the increase and depreciation of money, arising from the increase of bank institutions and other causes, perhaps the salaries of the officers named in the bill, as at first established in 1789, may now be considered as too low; but the great augmentation which by this bill we propose to make to some of those salaries, I cannot but consider as too high for the present time, and I must therefore vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. VARNUM.—My two colleagues have expressed an opinion, in which I agree, that the salaries of the officers mentioned in this bill as fixed before the year 1799, are, under the existing state of things, too low for the present time; but they have drawn different conclusions from this fact. I believe they are not now too high, and shall therefore vote in favor of the bill. For, although I voted in 1799 against the bill for augmenting salaries, I believe there is a perfect consistency in the vote I then gave and in that which I shall this day give. My colleague last up, has stated that rents are fifty per cent. lower in this city than they were at Philadelphia in 1799. For such an opinion I can find no data. In my mind, the statement is highly erroneous, and I believe the other statements of the gentleman are equally erroneous. I wish he had brought forward the data on which he hazarded such statements. He further states that provisions are at present forty or fifty per cent. lower than they then were. This remark may, perhaps, be just in its application to bread, but it will apply to that article only; and this arises from circumstances of a temporary nature, well known to every member of the House. There were greater crops of wheat the Summer before the last than were ever before known, and the surplus of those crops now on hand has reduced the price. My colleague lives in the midst of a country where one great staple article, beef, is raised in great quantities. I will ask him whether that article has been higher at any period since 1799 than it has been for three months past? You may go through all the other articles of living, and you will find them, on the average, to be about the same thing that they were in 1799. But will my colleague say that any kind of manual labor is now lower than it was at that time? He will not. He must acknowledge that the reverse is the case in the country where he lives, and that a laboring man is there enabled to procure more for the occupation of his time than he could five years ago. These being the facts, the conclusions of my colleague do not hold, when the principles on which he founds them do not exist. I have reasons which justify me for voting for the bill. I believe that a person in genteel life might entertain company in Philadelphia in the year 1799 as well for $3,500 as he can here at this time for $5,000. If this be a fact, of which I have no doubt, the salaries allowed by this bill bear only a proper proportion to those that then existed.

My colleague observes that we are in favor of making this bill perpetual. But he will recollect that the other day a resolution was introduced for making it temporary. Yet he voted against it, and though he now acknowledges that the salaries, as they stood before the year 1799, were too low, yet he does not make any specific proposition to increase them, but contents himself with voting against the whole bill.

My colleague has additional reasons for voting against this bill, inasmuch as it is propped up, he says, by the act of 1799. I voted for the amendment to which the gentleman refers for this reason: When the last act on this subject passed, we heard it echoed and re-echoed through the newspapers that an economical, saving Administration had raised their own salaries; and to prove this, a contrast must be made in distinct columns between the salaries as they existed previously to the passage of the act of 1799 and as they then stood; and in some districts of the country the people were deceived, and made to believe that this Administration, instead of continuing, had raised the salaries. This, together with the calumny, industriously circulated, that secret-service money to a vast amount was put into the hands of the President, alarmed the people. To prevent the repetition of like misrepresentation, I voted for the amendment.

Mr. V. concluded his remarks by observing that he should vote for the bill on the express principle that it did not give to Executive officers higher salaries in this place than they received in Philadelphia. In addition to this consideration, is it probable, inquired Mr V., that gentlemen competent to the discharge of the high duties of the first offices under the Government, will serve as low here as they would in New York or Philadelphia? Will they have no regard to the prospect of educating a rising family? Is this circumstance no inducement to an individual to accept a lower compensation where the means of educating his children exist, than in a place where they are not to be found?

Mr. ELLIOT.—I feel no disposition to detain the House many minutes upon this question. I shall be brief in my remarks, with the less reluctance, from the reflection that it is almost impossible, at the commencement of the debate, to say anything new upon the subject. But, as I represent a portion of the American people, than whom none are more attached to the principles of political economy, or more sparing in the compensation they afford their public officers, and, as the views I take are somewhat different from those of any gentleman who has spoken, I must be indulged in a very few observations.

I candidly confess, sir, that I have not examined this subject with that minute exactness with which I wish generally to investigate subjects of consequence that come before this House. To dispose my mind for a decision, I do not wish to calculate the exact differences between the prices of house rent, beef, flour, or butter, at Philadelphia or Washington, in 1799, or 1803; I do not wish to ascertain the precise sum necessary for the support of a family in genteel life; I do not ask what were the political sentiments of the men who raised the salaries to the present state; I do not ask for the information that the Governor of Massachusetts receives two thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents, nor do I wish to inform other gentlemen that the Governor of Vermont receives but seven hundred and fifty dollars as an annual salary. I am satisfied with general views of the state of society, of the importance of the offices in question, and the talents requisite for the discharge of their duties. These general views satisfy me that the blanks in the bill on the table have not been filled with sums too large. I think it unnecessary to attempt to form a scale of the relative usefulness of those persons who may fill these offices at different times. But is it possible to arrest the progress of society and manners? I wish we could be as simple and economical as the ancient Romans. But I think it in vain to strive to stop the progress of society to refinement, or even to luxury and extravagance. The present question is not, shall we augment salaries? But, shall we continue them as they are? Fears seem to be entertained by some gentlemen, that we must raise them hereafter, and some think the present law will be unpopular. We ought, undoubtedly, to raise them hereafter, if it should be necessary, but it is a strong argument with me in favor of the bill, that the quantum of salary, which it contemplates, has been established for some years; if we now reduce it, we shall have frequent complaints, and probably just ones, of its insufficiency, and we shall annually be employed in augmenting or reducing. I wish to make these salaries permanent, and to establish them on such a liberal basis, that there will be no probability of our being called upon again very soon for a further augmentation. My constituents are attached to the principles of economy. I am attached to them myself. But I believe that the whole people, were this subject properly explained to them, would be satisfied, although the round sums with which the blanks are filled seem so large to the farmer and to the day-laborer.

While I do my duty, I am regardless of the consequences to my own popularity, which may result from the vote which I shall now give. I wish for no popularity which is not founded on independence of sentiment, and conduct dictated by a liberal policy.

Mr. HOLLAND said, though it was probable he should ultimately vote for the bill, he considered it exceptionable on account of its permanency. He did not consider this a proper time to fix the permanent salaries of their officers. He looked forward to the time when those officers might execute their duties for a lower sum than that at present necessary. The present situation of this city rendered their discharge extremely inconvenient. But the time was fast approaching when the city itself would afford talents for filling these offices, which were at present drawn from a distance. For these, and other reasons, he was in favor of limiting the period of the bill. For this purpose, he moved a recommitment of the bill to a select committee, to fix a limitation to it.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—I know of no object for which this bill can be recommitment but to delay the proceedings of the House. I am satisfied the worthy member from North Carolina has no such intention; but such, notwithstanding, will be its effect. What has been the course pursued in this business? A gentleman from Virginia, in the first instance, made a motion for continuing, for a further and limited time, the law of March, 1799. It was objected, that this simple proposition did not give the individual members of the House an opportunity of canvassing the amount of salary allowed by that bill to each officer; and that a disposition might exist to increase some and to diminish other salaries. It was also objected that a temporary provision ought not to exist for permanent offices; and alleged that the House ought to be liberated from the unpleasant necessity of discussing the subject every two years. On this ground the resolution was disagreed to, and a substitute was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. That resolution was, not that it was expedient to continue the law of 1799, for a particular time, but that it was expedient to fix by law the salaries, or, in other words, to make them permanent. Not make them permanent, by putting it out of the power of the Legislature at any time, when they shall see fit, to alter them—for, at any future time, they will have a right to repeal this act—but to make them so far permanent as to relieve Congress from discussing the subject every session of a new Congress. Thus instructed, the committee reported a bill in blank. In filling up these blanks, every gentleman possessed the right of objecting to every item. The sense of the House was fairly taken, and the result was a determination to establish the salaries precisely on the same basis fixed by the law of 1799. Now, it appears to me, that if there really are any electioneering views within or without these walls, which I am sorry to see displayed on the floor of this House, gentlemen will be willing to fix the responsibility of raising the salaries upon certain members, and other gentlemen, if actuated by such motives, will not fix the responsibility on themselves, but place it where it ought to rest, by re-enacting the law of 1799. But, for myself, I entertain no fear of the public sentiment respecting any measure dictated, as this is, by a regard to the public good. I believe that, to legislate on other principles, is tacitly to say the people are incompetent to their own government.

So much as to the recommitment of the bill. When I came into the House, I found the reverend gentleman from Massachusetts delivereng his sentiments, on which I beg leave to offer a few remarks. I understood the reverend gentleman as maintaining that, in the discussion of this bill on a previous day, the salaries, as now established by law, were advocated from personal friendship to the gentlemen now in office. I can only reply for myself that I did not advocate them on that principle, and, for others, that if they advocated them from that principle, it altogether escaped my notice. Another objection of the reverend gentleman is, that an amendment, made by a gentleman from the same State with himself, (Mr. EUSTIS,) represents these salaries as the same with those established by the act of 1799. This is either a matter of fact, or it is not. Let gentlemen examine the laws; let them compare every salary fixed in this bill, with every salary established by the act of 1799, and say whether they are not the same. If this is the fact, can the insertion of the amendment, which is at most an act of supererogation, vitiate the whole bill? Is it sufficient that it contains a declaration of a fact which no one can deny, and which does not affect its details, to vitiate it? When the gentleman began his observations, I had not taken my seat. There may have, therefore, been some observations of weight which I did not hear. But, if the rest were of the same nature with those I did hear, I would wish it were consistent with the rules of our proceeding to have dispensed with the reading, and to have printed the speech for the use of the members, or of those for whom it was intended. In some of the remarks which I did hear, the reverend gentleman violated all the rules of the drama. I have always understood that the scape-goat had gone into the wilderness, and was never afterwards heard of. But a few days since he had been packed off by a gentleman from Connecticut, loaded with our political sins. Is it possible, then, that since last Friday, when we first heard of this scape-goat, that so many sins have accumulated upon us as to require the sending another scape-goat, in expiation of them, into the wilderness? The reverend gentleman may, however, say that he is not acquainted with the rules of the drama, and that they have nothing to do with his professional concerns; but still I should have supposed him better acquainted with his profession, than to have introduced this scape-goat a second time.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HOLLAND) has taken a ground that will defeat his own motion. He observes that there is not at present sufficient talents in the City of Washington for the filling of these offices; though there may be, in a short time. I should be happy if the citizens of Washington comprised persons capable of executing all the great offices of the Government; but I should look with regret to that time, if I supposed, when it arrived, there could be a necessity to fill those offices from such persons; as I never wish to see the time when all the great officers of the Government shall be taken from a disfranchised Territory. Independent of the consideration arising from the propriety of obtaining that information, which can only arise from a selection of men from the different parts of the Union, I never wish to see the time when these great officers shall be taken from men not endowed with the blessings of self-government.

For these reasons, I hope the bill will pass, and that this discussion will be laid aside, until, at some future day, it may be considered proper to enter into an inquiry as to the expediency of reducing or increasing the salaries. I believe, however, from the progress of society and the depreciation of money, the time will never come when it will be expedient to reduce them.

I will now say a word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HASTINGS,) who advocates a reduction of salaries, not because they are too high for men of eminent professional talents, but because they are enough for the men now in office. I understood him as saying the present salary was not too much for a gentleman once Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Hamilton,) respecting whom the only wonder was, that he had accepted that office, or, having accepted it, had so long continued to hold it.

Mr. HASTINGS desired to explain. He had stated that the first Secretary of State (Mr. Jefferson) had not resigned his office because his compensation was too small. He had stated that the Secretary of War had not, he believed, resigned solely on that account. He had stated that it was a matter of surprise, that a gentleman of such great professional talents as the first Secretary of the Treasury, had ever accepted, or, having accepted, had so long continued to hold the office.

While up, he would reply to his colleague (Mr. VARNUM,) who had asked if beef and other articles were not higher at present than they ever had been in the part of the country in which he lived. He would answer that they had not been so high in that part of the country for two or three years past, as they were in the year 1799.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I assure the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is no part of my intention to enter into a comparative view of the merits of the officers of the present Administration and those of the last.

I regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. VARNUM,) who possesses so strong a claim to the consideration of the House, should have made an exposition calculated to repel newspaper animadversion. I believe that it is a task beyond the power of that gentleman, or any other, to check its misrepresentations. I believe, likewise, that it is enough for a member of this House to repel arguments adduced on this floor, without descending to a warfare with the editors of newspapers.

Mr. HOLLAND said, he was very far from intending to say that the time was near at hand when all the offices might be filled by persons residing in this city. He only meant to say that some choice might be made from among them; and that the inducements would hereafter be greater to gentlemen to come forward than they were now. The only inducement that could now operate, was a sense of public duty. By coming here, gentlemen are placed in a state of exile, and cut off from all society.

Mr. SMILIE.—I hope, before this bill shall be recommitteed, we shall hear better reasons for it than have been yet adduced. I am sure, if the gentleman from North Carolina will candidly examine the reasoning he has used, he will be convinced there is no force in it. Does he really suppose that we shall ever see a state of society in which we shall be subjected to less expense than at present? As society progresses, so will expenses. But I am against the recommitment for another reason. This is a disagreeable subject to come before this House; and I would wish gentlemen in favor of making a temporary provision, to reflect that we are not now about giving these salaries a Constitutional establishment; that is not in our power; we are no more making them permanent than we have already made permanent the salaries of the President and Vice President, and our own compensations. If this bill passes, it will put the salaries of the officers provided for in it on the same footing with them. It will remain with the Legislature, at any future time, to raise or diminish them according to the circumstance of the country. As to a future diminution of them, I have no idea of it; on the contrary, I believe that men younger than myself, will live to see the time when they will be raised. An opposition to this bill may be considered by some gentlemen as the road to popularity. But this consideration shall never influence me. I believe the only road to popularity is to do what we think right, and what our consciences approve. It has always been a principle with me to have as few officers as possible, and to pay them well for their services.

My colleague (Mr. CLAY) has dropped an idea, that it is the wish of the people that these salaries should be reduced. If it is the wish of the people of his district, I cannot say that it is the wish of the people of mine. I voted last year for continuing these salaries, and yet my constituents have never blamed me; indeed, I have not heard the subject mentioned by them. I have confidence in the good sense of the people, and I believe that this discontent is not with the people. Have we not good reason to expect that they will be satisfied? Are not the great reductions we have made in the expenses of the Government known to them? Will they not be satisfied with these, and not regard the trifling differences between the amount of the present salaries and the proposed reductions? Mr. S. concluded, by saying that he differed with gentlemen on the expenses of living between this place and Philadelphia, considering the expenses here greater than they were there.

Mr. SKINNER, in reply to the remarks of his colleague, (Mr. HASTINGS,) stated that he was incorrect in his facts. He had stated the price of flour in 1799 at sixteen dollars a barrel. It was not so. It was only nine dollars. From his conversance with the shipping business, he was also justified in stating that beef and pork were now higher than they had been at any time heretofore.

Mr. EUSTIS.—It is well known in the State of Massachusetts that the salaries of the Governor and judges are not competent; and, for the many years that I have had the honor of a seat in the Legislature of that State, I have not known one in which there has not been a temporary grant in addition to the permanent compensations; and during the last year an act passed one branch of the Legislature for their increase. Hitherto, I have been satisfied with a silent vote on the subject, as I have been of opinion that the decision of the question depended upon circumstances on which the judgment of every member was made up, and which, I am sorry to say, have received no light from the long discussion which we have heard. Some gentlemen have gone into a detailed view of the expenses of living. If they had actually gone to market, and judged for themselves, they would have been convinced that these officers receive a bare competence. Let gentlemen look at the state of the country, what it is, and what it is to be. It is said that the present salaries are predicated on war prices. What war? Between France and England? Does not a war between the same nations now exist, and is it not probable that articles of life will rise as high as they were before?

These, however, are small considerations. The true question is, whether men of talents, equal to a discharge of the most important duties under the Government, will devote themselves to the service of their country, and how long, without remuneration? For my part, I acknowledge my surprise, that any gentleman should consider five thousand dollars too much for talents fitted to preside over the destiny of a nation. I am astonished at such an opinion. My own conviction is, that the present salaries are inadequate, and I know that, in some instances, the officers are trenching upon their private fortunes. I am still willing to continue the salaries without augmentation, as they were fixed in 1799. Let gentlemen look at the situation of our officers, and how long they are likely to be employed. In other Governments there is other provision besides salaries. After receiving a liberal compensation, an officer, under other Governments, retires with a pension or a peerage. But what is the fact with regard to the best of our officers, if their services are required till they have reached the age of three score years and ten? If they die, we wear a piece of black crape on our arm in commemoration of their services. If they survive their office, and are able to provide for themselves, it is well; but if they are not able, we make no provision for them. These, sir, are the cheapest services in the world; the salary is all; and they die with it, or by it. Gentlemen will perceive, from its amount, that it is impossible to lay by a farthing for the day of adversity.

As to the motion to limit the existence of the act, it is improper, because, if the war continues, the price of consumable articles will rise; besides that, the depreciation of money will operate a regular augmentation. And though the act be unlimited by itself, yet it will be in the power of the present, or the next, or any other Congress, to take it into consideration and act upon it according to their discretion. The limitation is, therefore, unnecessary, and may be vexatious; for no subject can be touched, so troublesome within doors, and more calculated to excite feeling out of doors.

I was unfortunately absent when my revered colleague made his observations on the amendment I had the honor to introduce. I understand him as being in favor of the principle of the bill, but as meaning to vote against it on account of that amendment. Not having the discriminating judgment of the gentleman, it may be my misfortune not to perceive how this furnishes him with an argument against the whole bill. I was, in the first instance, for re-enacting the act of 1799, in its very words; but, gentlemen not liking that course, the proposition to that effect was negatived, and another proposition agreed to. On this proposition, as its basis, a bill was brought in specifying the salaries given to the several officers. To this bill I offered the amendment now objected to. The gentleman from North Carolina objected to it as unnecessary; but the House overruled the objection, and determined that it should be incorporated in the bill. The House determined that it was proper; but whether it is proper or not will appear from a single consideration. We pass a bill fixing certain salaries; which bill appears, by itself, to be a new act, fixing new salaries, whereas the principle on which it is founded, has been practised upon ever since the year 1799. It appears, then, proper to trace this principle to its first origination. Not that it is my intention to derive a sanction to the measure from the act of 1799, but simply to record a fact undisputed and indisputable, that the salaries are now established as they were in 1799, that every man who reads this law may know it. It is no part of my intention to cast reproaches upon a former Administration. I know this is impossible; for, by agreeing to this act, I approve that measure, by giving to these officers the same salaries then given. I mean it simply as a matter of record.

One gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GODDARD,) with great facetiousness, proposed the other day that I should make proclamation of this fact. Why, the honorable gentleman, with his usual sagacity, has precisely hit my intention. It is, sir, my intention to make proclamation of this fact, or publication of it, that we may make it appear that this is a continuation of the same act passed by the gentleman and his friends, when they were in power, in the year 1799; and that the honorable gentleman may take it home and show his constituents, by an undisputed declaration on the face of it, that this is the same act with that passed in 1799; and that it may appear that we have done neither more nor less than continue, without augmentation or diminution, the salaries as established by the act of 1799.

Mr. J. CLAY.—I do not intend to trouble the House with any further observations on the general merits of the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts is the only one who, in my opinion, has adduced any arguments why these salaries should be raised. Under the idea that no answer is required, I intended to give a silent vote against the bill. I wish, by my vote, to oppose it in all its stages to the last. I will not, therefore, by voting for the present motion, with a view to render it less exceptionable, become accessory to any amendments which may ultimately induce others to vote for it. My colleague (Mr. SMILIE) has observed, though my constituents might be hostile to this bill, yet his are not. I congratulate him on the confidence his constituents have in him—a confidence which induced them, in 1799, to agree with him in voting against an increase of these salaries, and which, the last year, made them concur with him in voting for an increase.

Mr. SMILIE explained. He had not, he said, the honor of a seat in that House in the year 1799, when the salaries were raised. He had nothing to do with the business.

Mr. J. CLAY.—I beg my colleague's pardon; I was mistaken. But there are strong reasons to show that the salaries are too high. If I am not mistaken a gentleman, who holds an honorable situation in the Government, did, in the year 1799, vote against the augmentation of these salaries. I know, likewise, that in the place where I live, the people are extremely opposed to this measure. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERTS) has stated reasons for an increase of salaries, which, I trust, will have no weight with this House. He states that, in other countries, public men are rewarded with a peerage and a pension; and that this is the cheapest Government on earth. As long ago as the year 1740, we were told that the trappings of monarchy could furnish out many a commonwealth. I presume, however, the gentleman did not introduce this remark, to infer from it that it was proper for public servants to batten on the spoils of the people. If these are the sentiments of the gentleman, and correct, these salaries, if raised five times as high as they now are, will be infinitely too low.

Mr. EUSTIS.—It is due to myself and to the House, to do away the imputation of the gentleman last up. I never said that these salaries were incompetent, because they were not accompanied with a peerage or a pension. But I predicated their incompetency on the fact that they were barely adequate to defray the necessary expenses of living. I said, secondly, that the compensations were barely such as enabled the Executive to obtain men of talents; and I said, further, that they were lower than those granted by any other Government on earth; because other Governments had other means of remunerating their officers than this Government possesses. This is a fact known to the honorable gentleman and to every man in the nation. It is known that, under monarchies, there is first a splendid establishment provided for the officers while in place, and afterwards other remuneration. No; I do not desire in this country to see either monarchy, peerage, or pensions; and without pretending to any particular knowledge of the sentiments of the gentleman's constituents, I may say that mine are as averse as his can be to anything that wears the appearance of monarchy, and as unwilling to give away a shilling of the public treasure unnecessarily. But I do know, at the same time, that they feel a pride in paying for public services. They know, from fatal experience, from having paid their own officers too low, the necessity of an adequate compensation. In my part of the Union, there exists the same jealousy over the public expenditure; it is salutary, and I rejoice to see it. But, like the liberty of the press, to which we are indebted for the security of our rights, it may be carried too far. We are not able, if the ideas of the gentleman prevail, to ascertain what will be the effects. For, if we suffer a dereliction of the Government by men of talents and virtue, we cannot calculate the evil. It is such an evil that no price can be too great to avert it.

Mr. SANDFORD asked a moment's indulgence. He was opposed to the recommitment, because the object of the gentleman who introduced the motion was to give a limitation to the bill, as though it were not, without such limitation, subject to the control of Congress. The fact was, that Congress could at any time increase or diminish these salaries. Though in favor of them as they at present were, if good reasons should at any time be offered for their diminution, he should vote for a repeal of this act, though he was ready to declare that he did not expect such reasons could be offered. Why, then, limit the bill, when its sole effect would be waste of time in renewing this discussion at a subsequent day? As to the argument derived from lowness of State compensations, Mr. S. said, no comparison could be drawn between the duties of the State and Federal officers. He added that not a murmur of discontent among the people on this point had reached his ears. He was ready, therefore, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to vote according to the dictates of his conscience.

Mr. MITCHILL observed, that he had almost laid himself under an injunction to remain silent during the whole of this debate about salaries. But as the subject had not as yet been displayed by any of the gentlemen who had spoken upon it in the manner that it appeared to him most worthy of being stated to the House, he should, before the question was called, briefly offer his sentiments. I am opposed, said Mr. M., to high salaries and extravagant allowances of all sorts to men in office. But I am at the same time desirous that the citizens who are called from private life to stations of eminent honor and confidence, should have a sufficient compensation. A man who harters away the sweets of domestic enjoyment for the toil and envy incidental to most of the offices provided for in the bill, ought to receive from those whom he serves something more than merely his daily bread.

I must own I am not one of those who can, with the calculating powers which some gentlemen possess, exactly adopt the pecuniary reward to these great and responsible offices. I cannot put integrity, talents, and industry, in one scale of the balance, and throw dollars and cents into the other, until it descends to an equipoise. It surpasses my skill to weigh the rare endowments of the head, and the excellent qualities of the heart, which mingle in the character of an officer of State, against the copper, the silver, or even the gold, of which our coin is made. When I attempt to reduce patriotism, honesty, and intelligence, to a price, and to cypher out, by rules of arithmetic, what they are worth in money, I abandon the task as above my powers. And I am not ashamed to confess my inability to appraise the inestimable, I will say incalculable, value of genius, capacity, and virtue, in any denomination of paper current among men. I cannot gauge the human understanding, nor take the dimensions of moral fitness, with such exactness as to satisfy me in giving my vote, that the sums in the bill are exactly what they ought to be, without varying, in any degree, from the true amount of compensation. Employments of high trust and dignity have no tariff or market price to rate them. There is a something in a great and noble mind, that is far above comparison, or equivalent with anything the Mint affords.

But although the task just mentioned surpasses my ability, I do not quit in despair the subject out of which it grows. The problem by which professional men and official men ought to be paid, can be solved only by the aid of political arithmetic; or it can be made to approximate near enough to certainty to answer all the purposes of ordinary conduct. If a boy is destined to a profession, he is an object of expense through the whole course of his scholastic, collegiate, and professional studies. Whether he receives premiums, earns diplomas, or private license to practise, he is a constant drain upon the purse of his father. This expenditure must be made, although under the most favorable circumstances of health, capacity, and diligence, in the pupil. If he is idle, sickly, and perverse, the cost is usually greater.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

H. OF R.

Frequently a young man after acquiring a profession cannot gain a living by it, but must be maintained out of other funds than those which the exercise of his profession can raise. Now, in the progress of such a person's life, every dollar laid out upon him is to be considered as so much capital consolidated in his person. This capital is exposed to great risk, and without insurance. For the whole adventure is hazarded upon the life and health of the individual. A young man, therefore, upon whose education five thousand dollars have been expended, ought not only to support himself by the profession he has learned, but to reimburse with interest the capital which has been laid out upon him. This reimbursement ought to take place within the few years to which his life may be calculated to reach—for if he dies, there is a total loss of principal, interest, and prospects. But, in the case of lengthened days, a professional man ought to do more than pay his board and recover his capital in a moderate period of time. He ought to accumulate enough to maintain a family, to pay his assessments, and have a decent surplus for old age, and for descendants. All this a man who has undergone an expensive preparation for a profession ought to be able to do before his activity fails him, by the observance of industry and economy. If he does not do this, he has but a poor bargain of his profession. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that all professions are full of such hard bargains. The lottery of a profession has many blanks to a prize, and the prizes which are within the wheel are for the principal part of but moderate value. Though a few draw rich prizes, by far the majority are allotted blanks, or small prizes. This is so much the case that it has been questioned whether the profession of the law, deemed the most lucrative, upon the great scale actually supports itself. I think, therefore, that the individual practisers may grow very wealthy in a profession, yet professional talents are upon the average not compensated to their full amount in money. The reason is obvious, as man devoting himself to a profession expects honor and reputation from his calling—he courts the smiles of fame, and listens to the echoes of renown; and if he has a mind of that happy constitution which seeks its due proportion of glory, while it provides against want and accidents by an efficient system of ways and means, his reward is rich and ample. It is true he commutes pelf for celebrity; in leaving off a part of the selfishness of his nature, he becomes more a citizen of the world; and though he disposes of less property by his testament, he leaves to his family the precious inheritance of a great and a good name. Generally speaking, then, men who betake themselves to professions run an extraordinary risk for their profits, and these profits, after all, are not received in cash alone, but in a compound ratio of money and fame. It follows from this view of the subject, and it is indisputably the just one, that professional men, as such, receive a smaller return of profit on their professional stock or capital vested in their persons than any other species of adventurers in trade on equal capital and hazard.

Suppose then, sir, a professional man becomes an official character. Does he acquire a "pecuniary" reward equal to the amount that might be found due to him by a calculation on the principles which have been laid down? Certainly not. Speaking in gross, such official men as are contemplated in the bill now depending are not so well paid as professional men are. If the latter are underrated in their compensations, the same a fortiori must happen to the former. Take the career of one of these officers about whom there has been so much discussion among us. He possesses little or no chance of obtaining one of these distinguished appointments before the sun of his life has passed its zenith, and he is declining in the afternoon of age. Time must first have furrowed his face with wrinkles, and planted gray hairs on his temples under this preparatory course; and with such preliminary steps for preferment, what chance has the successful competitor to hold his possession long? Though his constitution should remain vigorous; though he should have husbanded his powers by temperance; though, like an evergreen tree, he shall have carried his juvenile verdure far into the winter of years; the incumbent on one of these benefices deceives himself if he calculates upon a protracted tenure. Though he should be favored with health, and have both the will and capacity to perform the duties of his station, he must expect, at the close of every lustrum or sooner, that a harsh decree from the mouth of political expediency will supersede his commission and oust him from his place. In the meantime the constant wear and tear of his animated machinery is going on, and he quits his office with a diminished ability to betake himself once more to the employment he may have relinquished.

It will be perhaps demanded, how the officer is to be made whole under all these casualties? I reply that his worldly reward is partly of an honorary and partly of a pecuniary kind. In some places of eminent trust and delicate responsibility, the virtue which is necessary to their execution is its own reward. Those emotions of laudable ambition which agitate the breast of man, and fill it with the desire of excellence, are in a great degree settled, I may say paid, by the very enjoyment and gratification they afford. The towering distinction, the elevated rank, and the far-sounding title of the statesman, who has reached these grades of promotion, are justly considered as making an essential and important part of what he ought to receive from the public. Nothing can afford the good and faithful servant so much delight as the approbation, the respect, and the confidence of his Sovereign. These are the most tasteful cordials in the cup of life. The accents of commendation and praise are so acceptable, that even the vicious part of public men procure them by venal means to be uttered in their ears. The godlike soul exults when the public voice concurs with the sentiment of self-approbation which it feels. But as men holding offices cannot sustain life by mere applauses, whether real or fictitious, and must be nourished and cherished by substantial fare, like their fellow-citizens, there must be some rule by which the amount of their salaries may be ascertained. I repeat, sir, that Congress should be moderate in all their allowances of this kind; and in order to calculate the amount of wages to be paid to the public servants, the market price of the articles they must purchase should be attended to. An examination of the leading objects of expense will enable a tolerable estimate to be made. The amount of salary should be such, (at least I am willing to consider it so) as to furnish payments for the rent of a decent house; for the food and drink of a middling family; for fuel, and for clothing, in the style of frugal gentility; for the hire of needful domestics; for taxes and other contingencies; for occasional charities, and the encouragement of good works. I would make an allowance for a horse or two, in a city almost destitute of lamps and pavements, to carry the officer from his dwelling, in such a sparse settlement, a mile or two to his place of business. To render him more capable of performing his serious functions, his mind will require seasonable amusement and recreation. He must also provide for the wants and education of his children; and after all these disbursements, he ought to be able, with prudence and economy, to lay up a little surplusage for future use.

If these several articles are charged at the existing rate, they will pretty nearly balance the sums with which it is proposed to pay the officers named in the bill. It may possibly be found, by a very nice scrutiny, that they are one or two dollars higher, or two or three hundred dollars lower than the exact state of the times require. This I am not disposed to investigate with fractional minuteness. The salaries have been proved by several years experience to suit their purposes tolerably well. There is no need whatever to raise them, and I think there would be an impropriety in lowering them at this time.

Before he resumed his seat, Mr. M. said he would offer a few further observations on salaries. In free, and especially in republican Governments, there might be danger of reducing them too low. As a republican, he would concisely advert to the operation of very low salaries upon the country at large. By such a regulation, which might be mistakenly termed by some an economical one, all persons not possessing large hereditary or acquired estates, would be excluded from offices. There would thereby be created a moneyed aristocracy of the most odious and alarming kind. It had been long remarked, that the most stern integrity, and the most useful talents, emerged from the middle or humbler walks of society. He wished that compensations might be such as to promote the evolution of genius and virtue, and bring them from their modest or sequestered abodes into action; and, in this way, well directed talents would continue to rule this land of freedom, as they always had done and of right ought to do. He thought there was a medium between too much and too little, which it was desirable to hit. This was to allow manly merit to come forth, though not attended with the recommendations of wealth. This was to apportion salaries to services in the way the bill proposed, neither with profusion on the one part, nor parsimony on the other.

Mr. BEDINGER said his only objection was to that part of the bill which prevented an inquiry into the just apportionment of the several salaries allowed. He was in favor of the general principle of the bill, though from the circumstance he had stated, he should be obliged to vote against it.

The question was then taken on recommitting the bill, and lost.

Mr. GODDARD.—I am sensible, Mr. Speaker, that to oppose the passage of a bill, the object of which is to give an increased compensation to men who may be personally respected, is, at any time, an invidious task. Opposition to the passage of the bill now on your table, is rendered peculiarly unpleasant from the severe reprehension which gentlemen meet with, who take the liberty to state their sentiments against its provisions; and, although I think the salaries proposed to be given by this bill are too high, yet I do not know but I should have contented myself with a silent vote on the subject, had it not been for the very singular amendment which, on the motion of an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) has been introduced into the bill, and the notice which that and another honorable gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) have seen fit to take of the few hasty remarks which, on a former day, I had the honor of submitting to the House. Notwithstanding the remarks which have fallen from gentlemen respecting that amendment, I still think that, with gentlemen at least with whom I have the honor generally to concur in opinion, it may form a solid objection against the passage of the bill, whatever may be their sentiments respecting its general provisions. By the terms of that amendment, the salaries are to be paid to the several officers therein named, "as established by the act of the 2d of March, 1799." Now, sir, for what purpose is this amendment introduced? Not to have any effect upon the bill itself; for it can have no beneficial effect; and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS) has told us that it is not for the purpose of casting any imputation or reproach upon those who passed the act of March, 1799, but simply for the purpose of recording a fact, and promulgating it to the people of the United States. But will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit me to ask whether, if he and his political friends had been in power at the time when the temporary act of March, 1799, passed, this amendment would ever have appeared in the bill? Would there, in that case, have been such solicitude to record this fact? If not, why introduce it now? The gentleman says, to serve as the proclamation which he says I some days past proposed as a substitute for this amendment; and the gentleman is good enough to give me leave to carry it home for the benefit of my constituents in Connecticut.

Another gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. VARNUM) has added that when the act of 2d of March, 1799, was revived and continued in force by the act of the 14th of April, 1802, an attempt was made, and which excited some uneasiness among the people, to prove that those who passed the last act had raised the salaries of the Executive officers of the Government; and, sir, let me say that it was successfully done. I do not mean successful in any effect produced by it, but successful in proving the position that the salaries were raised by that act. How stands this matter? At the time when the act of 14th of April, 1802, passed, the Secretaries of State and the Treasury were each entitled, by the law then existing, to receive, as a compensation for their services, the sum of $3,500 annually, and no more; by virtue of the act of April 14, 1802, they were severally entitled to receive the sum of $5,000, and yet, by some political legerdmain, gentlemen attempt to prove that they did not raise those salaries! Such also is the case with respect to every other officer named in the bill, and yet this amendment is to proclaim to the people of the United States, that under this Administration salaries are not raised! It is true, that in March, 1799, owing to the high price of living and other circumstances, a temporary act passed increasing the compensation, but for a limited time. It is expressed, in so many words, in that act, that it should continue in force for three years, and no longer. It expired, by its own limitation, on the 31st day of December, 1801, operating only upon the years 1799, 1800, and 1801; and it was a mere dead letter at the time of passing the act of April, 1802. And is it, sir, for the purpose of informing the people of the United States that such an act passed, that this provision is introduced into a permanent law? Who ever denied, and who does not know, that such an act passed at that time? Does the gentleman seriously suppose that the people of this country are so ignorant as not to know this? or that they need information on this subject? But, sir, the amendment purports to record a fact which I do not consider as existing. It holds out the idea that the compensations given by this bill were established in 1799. The term, established, conveys an idea of permanency, and it is agreed by all, that the act in question was of a temporary nature, and long since expired. If, as a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS) has said, the bill under consideration is so perfectly correct and proper, and its provisions so just, as to induce him to express his astonishment that any gentleman should oppose it, why, let me ask, not permit it to stand upon its own intrinsic merit, and not attempt, in this strange manner, to ingraft it upon an act of his predecessors? Why are not gentlemen willing to take upon themselves the responsibility of their own acts? If measures are adopted which are deemed popular, I perceive no indisposition in gentlemen to claim the merit of them. Why, then, let me ask, do they wish, in this manner, to devolve the odium of those which they think otherwise, upon their predecessors? I do not consider myself responsible for all which may have been done by those who have gone before me, and whom I generally respect; and I had hoped, sir, if the quotation does not give offence to certain gentlemen, that the time might have arrived when it should no longer be said, politically, that the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge. If, therefore, gentlemen are determined to persevere in legislating in this manner, I should consider myself perfectly justified in voting against the passage of this bill, whatever might be my sentiments respecting its general provisions.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Salaries of certain Officers.

But, sir, there are other objections in my mind against the passage of this bill, which do not apply to the question, whether the salaries generally are too high or too low.

I took the liberty on a former day to state some objections respecting the salary of the Attorney General, and wish now to make myself understood on that subject, and I hope, sir, that what I may say will not be considered as having allusion to the gentleman who now sustains that office, for I was educated in habits of respect towards him; but I do conceive that error has crept in, and a misconstruction been adopted, respecting the compensation given to that officer; and whether the salary is too high or too low, we are about to sanction that misconstruction, and increase the salary of the Attorney General much more in proportion than we do other officers of Government.

By a law which passed September 23, 1789, the salary of the Attorney General was fixed at $1,500. By another law passed March 2, 1797, it was increased $500, making in the whole $2,000. By another law afterwards passed, an additional annual compensation of $600 was granted to that officer, for services to be performed under the sixth article of the British Treaty, which was to be allowed him during the continuance of those services. Afterwards and before the Attorney General had ceased to perform services under the British Treaty, and while he was in the reception of the sum of $600 annually on account of those services, as well as the other sums which I have stated, the act of the 2d of March, 1799, passed, and what, sir, were the terms of that law? "In lieu of the salaries heretofore allowed by law, the following annual compensations are hereby granted," &c., and then giving to the Attorney General the sum of $3,000. Not, sir, in lieu of the compensation which he was entitled to by any one or two laws, but in lieu of the salary heretofore allowed by law—by any existing law; comprehending, I believe, as well the $600 for services under the sixth article of the British Treaty, as any or all other sums, to which by law he was entitled; and yet it has been said that the Attorney General has received under all these laws the sum of $3,600 annually, by what construction I am unable to decide; and now, sir, when the performance of all services under the British Treaty have wholly ceased, we are about to sanction a misconstruction of our laws, and render permanent the salary of the Attorney General at $3,000.

But, sir, in my opinion, there is very good reason why the salary of that officer should not be high. If he is selected from among professional gentlemen, who resides at the seat of Government it will be only paying him for some opinions which will not much interfere with his other business. If a gentleman is called from distant parts of the Union, a man of talents and high respectability will probably be selected. He will come to the seat of Government under very favorable circumstances; the office will increase his reputation. The sessions of the Supreme Court of the United States will always be held here. Causes of the first magnitude, from all parts of the Union, and which will of course afford the largest fees, will there be litigated. The Attorney General we may suppose will be the first person applied to, and the office, in that way, will furnish him with much greater compensation than any other officers are entitled to.

H. OF R.

Salaries of certain Officers.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have another objection to the passage of the bill on your table, of a special nature, and not relating to the question whether the salaries are too high, or too low.

By this bill, the sum of $5,000 is proposed to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury. In all that has been said on the subject of the comparative prices of provision, and the expenses of living in Philadelphia in the year 1799, and this place, at the present time, no gentlemen say that they are greater now than at that time. Some gentlemen undertake to prove that they are not as great.

By a recurrence to the Journal of this House, at the time when the temporary act of 1799 passed, annexing for a limited time, to that office, the same salary which is now proposed to be given, I find the name of the gentleman who now holds that office, and who was then a distinguished member of this House, recorded against the passage of that law. He thereby has declared to the world, that the sum now proposed to be given, is too great for the performance of the duties of that office. This is the best evidence in the present case. Was not that gentleman a competent judge? If he was, shall we give to a public officer a greater sum of money than he himself thinks his services are worth? He cannot in conscience receive a greater salary than that fixed by the law of 1799. And if we persevere in passing this bill, we shall place that officer in a very delicate situation; we shall compel him to take a greater compensation for his services than he believes they merit.

I find also, on examining the same Journal, that more than twenty gentlemen, who were members of this House in 1799, when the act so often referred to passed, and who voted against its passage, are now members of this House, and not one of them, I believe, on any of the questions which have been taken, respecting this bill, have voted against it. Some of them have spoken in its favor. Gentlemen may be consistent in doing this, and I dare say they have reasons which, in their own mind, justify their votes; what they are, is not for me to inquire. One gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SKINNER,) who voted against that bill, has indeed told us, that if gentlemen should change some of their opinions once in the course of five years, he does not think it exposes them to the charge of inconsistency. I can certainly have no objection to gentlemen's acknowledging that they were formerly in an error, and I am very willing that the work of reformation should progress, and that gentlemen should correct other errors which they then entertained.

Having made these remarks, I might content myself to vote against this bill, finding it liable to the several objections I have stated. But, sir, I ask the patience of the House, while I submit a few remarks upon its general provisions.

I have listened with much attention to the arguments of an honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. S. MITCHILL) on this subject. The first part of his remarks went to prove, that the pecuniary compensation generally given to professional men is very inadequate to their services. This argument, as a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) saw fit to observe, respecting that of an honorable and very respectable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. TAGGART,) I should be glad to have printed, not so much for the use of members of this House, as for the benefit of a certain class of people, called clients. But the gentleman from New York adds, that professional men take a part of their compensation in money, and a part in fame. Of this latter article, that gentleman has received a large share, and I do not know but he has, also, of the former. But he has proceeded to show, by a course of ingenious reasoning, that high salaries are necessary to be given to support a Republican Government. A few years ago, arguments in abundance were used, to prove that low salaries were essentially necessary, to support a Republican Government.

I speak not of any used by the gentleman from New York, for I do not know what were his sentiments formerly. But it now seems very easy to prove that high salaries are necessary to be given, to call men from the lower and middle walks of life, and induce them to aspire to your first offices. [Here Mr. MITCHILL rose and said, that he had not contended that high salaries were necessary for this purpose.] Mr. G. proceeded: High and low are relative terms; I am sensible the gentleman advocates only the salaries to be given by the bill on your table. That gentleman may call them low, I call them high, and considering them as high, I say, that it is now easy to prove, that high salaries are necessary to be given to support republicanism; and I do not know to what extent they may not ultimately be raised, to do this. In the French Republic, many millions of livres annually are not thought too high to be given to the First Consul, to support his Republican Government, and I know not how soon similar provisions may be thought necessary, to support her sister Republic, in America. A compensation has certainly been given there, sufficient to call, from the middle walks of life, a Corsican soldier, to support by his talents that Republic. And we have the more reason to fear that similar inducement will be held out here, as, according to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. R.) on a former day, nothing is consistent but keeping salaries in the ascending series; for the gentleman seemed to suppose that gentlemen who formerly voted against the present salaries, might now very consistently vote for them; but that those who formerly voted for them, would now act very inconsistently to vote against them. And to what extent this sort of consistency is to be carried, I do not know, but we may conjecture from the opinion which has been here expressed, of the almost incalculable value of the services of some officers, and their claim upon the public gratitude.

But permit me, sir, to state my view of this subject generally. I am perfectly content to give to the officers of Government a reasonable and just compensation for the services which they render. It is difficult to determine the abstract question, what that is. In my opinion we ought not to consider it in an abstract point of view, but relatively only. It ought to be adapted to the nature, genius, and situation of Government. We are in our youth, and the compensation to be given to the officers to be provided for by this bill ought to bear some proportion to those given to the other officers of our Government. Compare, sir, a salary of five thousand dollars, now proposed to be annexed to the offices of Secretary of State and the Treasury, to the salaries given to the officers of your State governments. Do the States give to their Governors, their Judges, or any of their highest officers, a sum to be compared to this? I cannot answer for them all, but I believe there is not existing, under any of the State governments, a permanent salary of this magnitude. In some of them, I know, they fall far short of this sum. And are not those offices filled by men of the first talents? It will not be doubted.

But, if gentlemen do not like this comparison, let me ask them to compare these salaries with others under the General Government. Look at the salaries which you give to the judges of your Supreme Court. These were established in the year 1789, and have remained unaltered. And I have seen no attempt made to increase them. The salary given to your Chief Justice is $4,000; and that to the other justices $3,500 each. Will any gentleman tell me that these offices ought not to be filled with men of pre-eminent talents?

And are not the duties of their offices very laborious? Aside from their duties in court they are obliged to travel from one end of the United States to the other—deprived of those domestic comforts of which gentlemen have justly spoken so highly, and not only exposed to much bodily and mental fatigue, but subjected to heavy expenses in their travels. And yet gentlemen seem perfectly contented to suffer their salaries to remain as they are, and will give to the officers of the Executive departments, who reside constantly with their families at the seat of Government, a compensation much beyond theirs! Let gentlemen pursue the comparison further, if they please, and inquire what sums are given to the district judges, and, indeed, any other officers of Government, and they will find that they all fall short—very far short—of the compensations proposed to be given by this bill. Gentlemen have mentioned our own compensation, as members of this House, and, in doing it, the gentleman from Kentucky,

Sth Con.—20

(Mr. SANDFORD.) and also the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH) seem disposed to descend into the vale of humility, when comparing their own talents and services, as members of this House, with those of some of the officers for whom we are providing. I am content to go along with them, and have no disposition to compare my talents or services with theirs. Yet, let me say, sir, that it is essentially necessary that these seats should be filled with men of the first talents. For, unless your legislators are qualified to judge of the measures proposed to them by the Executive department of the Government, they will become the humble tools of the Executive, will only echo his will, and become the registers of his edicts.

There is, therefore, the same necessity, of which gentlemen have so often spoken, of giving such compensation as will call forth the services of the first men to act in a Legislative capacity. And what do you give your Senators and Representatives? The annual sum of eight hundred and ten dollars! I know very well that a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. SANDFORD,) on a former day, made this compensation amount to more than two thousand dollars annually. Upon what principles he calculated, I cannot conceive. I take as the basis of calculation the estimate laid on our tables from the Treasury Department for the service of the year 1804. That calculation is made upon the supposition that Congress will be in session four and a half months, or one hundred and thirty-five days in a year. This amounts to the sum of eight hundred and ten dollars only. I am sensible that there is an addition for the expenses of travelling to and from the seat of Government; but that is supposed to be given on account of those expenses. Whether the gentleman from Kentucky made his calculation by including travelling compensation, for I do not know at what distance he lives from this place, or by computing on a session for the whole year, I do not know, but I presume the latter.

Any gentleman who has been a member of this House knows, that attendance here, necessarily deranges, for the year, any other business in which he may be engaged. Now, sir, I do not complain that our compensation is not high enough. No difficulty is found in inducing gentlemen to accept seats here; but the point which I attempt to prove is, that the salaries contained in this bill are too high. Compare the sum of eight hundred and ten dollars, our annual compensation, with the sum of five thousand dollars, to be given to some of your officers, by this bill, and who will say it is not too much? In examining all the subordinate offices under this Government, none will be found to furnish salaries which compare at all to those in the bill on your table, excepting those mentioned by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) on a former day. I refer to the collectorship of certain ports. I am sensible we have a law by which it is declared that collectors' compensation shall not exceed $5,000.

But, let it be remembered, that we do not give to those officers a salary, but a per centage upon the business which they do, and something is doubtless allowed as a premium for the risk of receiving and paying over large sums of money; yet, while I give this answer to that case, stated by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. R.,) I wish not to be understood to say that the compensations given to some of those officers are not too high. I believe they are, and if the gentleman pleases, I am ready to join him in this reduction. For, sir, there are officers, and some in the State from which I come, who, a few years ago, could declaim against high salaries, declare that compensations were too high, when they were much less than they are now, and make orations to publish it to the world, and assert that five hundred or one thousand dollars, at most, was an abundant compensation for the performance of the duties of offices, from which some of those very men now pocket, with much complacency, between three and four thousand dollars a year.

[Here Mr. NICHOLSON called Mr. G. to order, which occasioned some remarks from Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. LOWNDES; when the SPEAKER declared Mr. G. to be in order. He again rose and said, although he had been so happy as to have a decision from the Chair, that he was in order, yet the intimation from the gentleman (Mr. N.) had given him time to repress a warmth which sometimes attended him in debate, and, but for this interruption, might have led him away from the question under immediate discussion. He would endeavor not to make any more remarks which should give the gentleman uneasiness.]

I have no disposition, said Mr. G., to proceed further with a comparison of the salaries contained in the bill on your table, and those of any other officers of your Government.

But, on a former day, our attention was called first from the subject immediately before us to the contingent expenses of this House, of the War and Navy Departments, as well as to the general expenditures belonging to those departments, and we were told that here were the great sinks of the public money, and here we ought to turn our attention if we wished to make retrenchments in our expenses. Why, sir, is this done? Did the gentleman from Virginia mean to say that the expenses, to which he has referred us, are improper and extravagant? If so, let us correct the abuse; if not, why call our attention to the subject at all? If improper expenditures are made from the contingent funds, or in anything connected with the departments referred to, retrench them. But surely this can furnish no reason why we should give extravagant salaries by this bill. If the expenses there are no greater than they should be, unless this subject is only brought into view to show us that, of necessity, we must expend large sums there; it furnishes another reason why we should exercise economy here, that we may be better enabled to meet the necessary expenditures there.

But, the gentleman says, this is but the saving of a barley-corn, and ought not to be regarded.

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and said he did not say so.]

Mr. GODDARD.—Pepper-corn, sir, I believe, was the gentleman's expression, and perhaps it is a more proper word for him to use. But the word is immaterial, and the sentiment, I think, is incorrect.

Let us now exercise our best judgment on the subject now before us, and see to it that we authorize no improper expense by this bill; and, as other subjects may be presented us, conduct in the same manner as to them. I should be perfectly content to give just and reasonable salaries to all public officers, and those contained in the old permanent law may be too low. But, I cannot be induced to vote for the sums contained in this bill, through fear of not being able to call into exercise the talents of the best men in the nation. I have heard this argument used here and elsewhere in favor of high salaries; but is it not, let me ask, an argument founded on theory and not on experience? It is the least of the difficulties which the Government has to encounter, that of inducing men to accept its offices; and when we shall find, from experience, that suitable men will not accept our offices, on account of the small compensation annexed to them, it may be time to apply the remedy now proposed, and raise their salaries. For a period of ten years, from the commencement of the Government until the year 1799, men of the first talents and integrity were found to fill the offices now in question for the salaries contained in the old law, which this will repeal; and when the men in power shall have evinced their patriotism by a like period of service for the like compensation, it may be time to increase it.

But, at present, the bill on your table being liable to the several objections which I have stated, and the salaries therein given being comparatively higher than other salaries enjoyed under the General or State governments, I shall give my vote against its passage.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—I am sensible, with every gentleman who has spoken on this subject, that it is one, on which every member has made up his mind. But as the gentlemen have, in discussing it, gone into other questions, and have misrepresented what has fallen from the friends of the bill, I must beg the attention of the House for a few minutes.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GODDARD) has stated—and I hope the Chair and not the gentleman will correct me in case I misrepresent what has fallen from him—for I must be permitted to say that the manner in which you, sir, have uniformly executed its duties give an ample pledge that I shall be corrected if I do misrepresent him; the gentleman has stated that the amendment, introduced into the bill, is contradicted by fact. The first section of the bill is in these words: "That, from and after the end of the present year, the following annual compensations and no other be, and they are hereby, granted to the officers herein enumerated, respectively, that is to say." The whole question then is, whether the same salaries are established by this bill as were established by that act. The act has been repeatedly read, or I should call on the Clerk to read it now to prove that the compensations allowed by it are precisely those of the bill under consideration. But, says the gentleman, these salaries were not established by that act, because it was limited to a term of years. The gentleman may give the word "established" any meaning he pleases; but it is not for him to make this House give it a meaning which they are persuaded it does not bear. Let me ask him if the phrase "established for two years," may not be used with strict propriety? Has he never heard of temporary and permanent establishments—of War and Peace Establishments; and is there not an almost annual fluctuation in their extent and amount? I desire then to know whether it becomes him, under these circumstances, to declare that the amendment adopted by this House (to use his own words) purports that to be a fact which is not a fact.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

H. OF R.

The same gentleman has undertaken to show that, in the observations which I offered on Friday on this subject, I endeavored to prove that abuses existed in other departments, and that those abuses ought to sanctify these. On this occasion, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the fact, and I have no hesitation to say that the fact is not so. If I did say what the gentleman represents, I beg the correction of the Chair. I stated that in the Treasury Department, the expenses were equal to $70,000, and that of this sum the salaries did not amount to $30,000; that if it was the object of the House to effect a reform, they ought to take up the departments themselves, and not to strike barely at the salary of the principals. I repeat it, if gentlemen mean reform, let them reform the department itself. But let us not gain less than $10,000, by only striking at the salaries of a few officers, whose responsibility and capacity entitle them to superior compensation. I did state, not that these departments, but those of the military and marine were the great sinks of the treasure of every nation. What does the gentleman make me say? Why that our own departments of the military and marine were the great sinks. Sir, I stated no such thing; I believe no such thing. By making particular a general assertion, my meaning has been totally perverted. I can scarcely conceive how any military or naval force can be maintained for less cost than our own—although I am ready to repeat that such establishments are the sinks of national treasure. The assertion is sustained by the expense which we pay even for our small army and navy.

I will again call the attention of the House to the estimates laid on our tables. The expenses of the Department of State, exclusive of those of foreign intercourse, amount to $22,000. The gentleman is for striking at a single salary. I am unwilling to do this. I am for going through the whole Department if any reduction is commenced. In the Treasury Department the expenses are $70,000. Pursue the ideas of some gentlemen, and there will be a saving in the salary of the Secretary of $1,500, of the Comptroller $850, of the Treasurer 600, of the Auditor $600, of the Register $400, something less than $4,000; and that is all. In the War Department the expenses amount to $28,000. If the salaries of the Secretary and Accountant are reduced as is proposed, there would be a retrenchment of $1900, and this would be the amount of the saving. But the gentlemen have not ventured to propose the general reduction of the War establishment, which costs the nation (even now) the annual sum of $363,000. A saving to the same amount would, by a like reduction, be made in the Navy Department, whose expenses, under the most economical arrangements which have been made under this Government, amount at present to $650,000, which have exceeded heretofore $1,000,000, and in times not very remote several millions. I find the expenses of the Judiciary estimated at $98,000, and a saving is proposed to be made by retrenching $600 from the salary of a single officer, the Attorney General. I have no desire to diminish the salaries of any officers in this department, in which there appears to me to be an economical disbursement of the public money. When I speak, however, of the economy of the department, I mean not to refer to that portion of expenditure which is made in the District wherein we are now deliberating; for I find that the estimate "for defraying the expenses of the supreme, circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, also for jurors and witnesses in aid of the funds arising from fines, forfeitures, and penalties, incurred in the year 1804, and preceding years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of prosecution for offences against the United States and for the safe-keeping of prisoners," amounts to $40,000.

I did on Friday express myself, that if gentlemen were seriously bent on retrenchments, they ought to take up the departments generally; particularly the marine and military; and, after reforming them, take up the civil list; thus revising the expenses of a whole department, and not striking at the salary of individual officers. I did say that to make a saving of not quite $10,000, in this way, out of an expenditure of millions, was to bring a mere pepper-corn into the exchequer. The term was used on a most memorable occasion, and by an ever to be venerated man. It was used by Lord Chatham, on the project to tax this country. It was then declared by that illustrious statesman, that all the revenue which could be wrung from this country would be but a poor equivalent compared with the services we had rendered, and should render Great Britain as allies, as customers, and as friends, and the miserable financier was denounced who would bring a pepper-corn into the exchequer at the expense of millions to the nation. And I now say, that the saving of $10,000, out of the salaries of officers, who ought to be the ablest men in the world, on whose talents and virtue depends the peace and welfare of the country, and the honest expenditure of millions, would be to bring a pepper-corn into the exchequer.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GODDARD,) in the course of his observations, has expressed a hope that the advice which my learned friend from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) had given to the House would be taken by his clients.

If I could arrogate to myself the right of giving advice to any member of this House I would recommend to their patron one rule, a rigid adherence to which will always keep up the appearance of saying something on a subject. Whenever you are unable to answer your adversary, always answer yourself. Having only yourself to answer, you insure one important point—the being equal to a reply.

H. OF R.

Bankrupt Law.

This remark applies with peculiar force to the statement which has been made of what has fallen from my friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) not one of whose arguments the gentleman has answered, though he has misrepresented them all. Mr. R. concluded by observing that he wished a mode could be devised of bringing members back to the subject under consideration, and by which also a gross misrepresentation would receive a proper correction.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the passage of the bill—yeas 76, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun., Nathaniel Alexander, Isaac Anderson, John Archer, David Bard, William Blackledge, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, George W. TUESDAY, November 22.

Two petitions of sundry residents and purchasers of lands in the State of Ohio, were presented to the House and read, respectively submitting to the consideration of Congress, certain propositions of amendment to the existing laws relative to the sale of the lands of the United States, lying within the said State, which they pray may be adopted, as well to enable the industrious residents or emigrants to purchase a quantity of land proportionate to their capital, as to promote the general interests of the Union.

Ordered, That the said petitions be severally referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. MORROW, Mr. DWIGHT, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. BRYAN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. NEWTON called for the order of the day on a resolution, laid by him on the table, for repealing the Bankrupt law.

Mr. J. CLAY moved a postponement till the 2d of February 1804, in order to allow, in the mean time, an opportunity to inquire into the practicability of so amending the law as to render its provisions just, and agreeable to the community.

This motion was supported by Messrs. J. CLAY, NICHOLSON and GREGG, and opposed by Messrs. NEWTON, ELLIOT, SMILIE and EUSTIS.

Mr. GRISWOLD suggested the propriety of postponing the consideration of the subject to a shorter day. Mr. J. CLAY acquiesced.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved a postponement to the first Monday of January.

This motion was supported by Messrs. HUGER, DANA, ALSTON and GODDARD; and opposed by Messrs. NEWTON, DAWSON, RODNEY, SMILIE, and RANDOLPH.

When the question on postponement was taken, and lost—yeas 19.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. NEWTON's resolution for repealing the Bankrupt law.

Mr. NEWTON and Mr. SMILIE advocated a repeal, and Mr. JACKSON and Mr. EARLY opposed it; when the Committee rose and asked leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be directed to inquire into the expediency or inexpediency of making provisions, by law, for all those officers and soldiers who were disabled by wounds in the Revolutionary army, and for whom no provision has heretofore been made by law; and report by bill, or otherwise.

BANKRUPT LAW.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution, offered by Mr. NEWTON, for repealing the Bankrupt law.

The resolution was advocated by Messrs. NEWTON, ELLIOT, SMILIE, HASTINGS, STANFORD, and RANDOLPH; and opposed by Messrs. JACKSON, EARLY, SKINNER, and EUSTIS.

[The advocates of repeal observed that though the resolution had laid on the table for a considerable time, purposely with a view to collect public opinion, no remonstrance hostile to it had been received from any part of the Union, and that this circumstance indicated the unfavorable sentiment entertained of the bankrupt system; and that even among those most materially interested in its provisions, a dead silence prevailed. Some gentlemen were averse to the repeal, inasmuch as the law would expire by its own limitation, in a few years; but the House should recollect that in the mean time they were responsible for all its evils and iniquities. If, too, it should be suffered to die a natural death, the inevitable effect would be that those who are now struggling to avoid bankruptcy will precipitate themselves into such a situation as to avail themselves of its benefit.

With regard to the principle of the present bankrupt system, and probably of any other bankrupt system that could be devised, it was unjust, inasmuch as it favored one class of citizens, the merchants, at the expense of all other classes; to advance the interest of the first it sacrificed the interests of all the other members of the community. To prove this, it was only necessary to illustrate it by the common case of a merchant availing himself of the benefits of bankruptcy, and thereby cancelling the demands of the mechanic or the farmer who might be his creditor; and of the same individual mechanic or farmer, the debtors of another merchant, remaining his debtor with their property subject at any period of their life to his seizure. In the case of the insolvent merchant his debts were totally discharged; whereas in the case of the insolvent mechanic and farmer, they were of eternal obligation. The preferable system was that established by the several States, which existed before the bankrupt system, and which still existed, extending to all insolvent debtors the same relief.

It was contended that the partial operation of the bankrupt system had the most mischievous influence on the morals of the mercantile world. That it operated as an impunity to fraud and negligence; that it created extensive credits, and excited a spirit of the most prodigal expenditure; that although the American merchants were probably the most honest, and certainly the most able and enterprising in the world, the facility with which credits were obtained, and the impunity with which risks were incurred, had, under the auspices of this law, introduced into their private expenditures a ruinous extravagance; and that nothing was more common than to see a merchant, of but small capital, living at an expense superior to that of the European trader who had realized his plum, and at an expense which shamed the frugal disbursements of the affluent planter. What were the effects? The scene of luxury and splendor was enjoyed for a few years, and was succeeded by a failure. Did it become the Legislature to encourage, or repress this spirit?

The principle of the bankrupt system was inequitable as it regarded the relation of debtor and creditor. However it might be averred to the contrary, it was a truth that its provisions operated to the advantage of the debtor, and of course to the detriment of the creditor. There was no weight in the remark that the commission was taken out at the instance of the creditor, as that was merely a nominal act, a creditor usually being made use of who was the friend of the bankrupt. That it operated to the benefit of the debtor was clear from its liberating all his future acquisitions, after availing himself of the benefit of a commission, from seizure: whereas under an insolvent law the person alone was released. That hence sprang up a ten-fold temptation to fraud under this act, over that which existed under the common insolvent laws. For that under the latter an insolvent debtor, if guilty of a fraudulent concealment of property, could at any future period be called upon to satisfy the claims of his creditors by a delivery of his visible property; while, under this law, the bankrupt may live in the greatest splendor, even ostentatiously displaying his property, without rendering it liable to seizure. Fraud once successfully perpetrated and concealed, every restraint is removed; and so deleterious had this effect been that it had manifestly inflicted a deep wound upon the confidence of man with man in the ordinary transactions of life.

It was further contended, that while justice and humanity dictated the liberation from arrest of the body of the unfortunate debtor, justice inhibited the exoneration of property from going to satisfy just debts; that the obligation, wherever the ability existed to pay just debts, was eternal, and that this law, in having a retro-active effect, was unjust. Evils infinitely greater had been inflicted by inconsiderate and fraudulent debtors taking refuge in the provisions of the bankrupt law than from all the inhumanity exercised by merciless creditors over unfortunate debtors. That the principle of the bankrupt law was also retro-active, inasmuch as it destroyed the grade of dignity existing in many of the States, by which a bonded debt obtained a preference over an open account; that it absolutely impaired the subsisting contract between the person holding and the person signing the bond.

It was remarked that the principle of the bankrupt law, however good in theory, could never be carried into effect, as had been proved by a long course of British experience, without a recurrence to those sanguinary laws which they had introduced for the prevention and punishment of fraud, but which were so abhorrent to our code of laws that public opinion could not tolerate them.

The expenses of going through the forms of bankruptcy constituted no inconsiderable objection to the system. The appointment of a Commissioner was understood to be in no small degree lucrative, and the various processes through which the bankrupt was compelled to go, in practice, reduced the little property he had left to a state still less. Indeed, from the practical effects of the system, it would appear that it had been made more for the emolument of the Commissioner than for the benefit of the creditor.

However necessary this system might be in England, who owed almost the whole of her prosperity to trade, it became not a nation, the leading feature of whose character was agriculture, to tread in her footsteps; but, on the contrary, to avert rather than to hasten the period when such a system would be rendered necessary; that, in truth, the spirit of trade in this country was sufficiently vigorous, and only required the common protection given to all other occupations, to prosper to every beneficial purpose.

In the commercial world, the honest, though unfortunate merchant, had nothing to fear from his creditors. A long experience had shown that the mercantile world felt with sympathy and acted with magnanimity to the unfortunate. In addition to these objections, it was urged that the bankrupt law was injurious, as it enlarged the sphere of the Federal courts. The Constitution was a system of compromise. Many powers were given without a view to their immediate exercise. It did not, therefore, follow that, because the power given to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy was given, it must now be exercised. The powers of the General Government, if not too great, were sufficiently great. It became Congress, therefore, neither to take from or add to the powers of the State courts. To increase the powers of the Federal courts, through the operation of the bankrupt system, was to derogate from the powers of the State courts. The State tribunals were weak enough, without thus trenching upon them.

The authorities under this law not only went to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government generally, but particularly to the extension of Executive power. The appointment of Commissioners of bankruptcy was an additional weight thrown into the scale of Executive patronage. The power of that Department ought to be viewed with an eye of jealousy, and the House, however willing to allow to it the enjoyment of all fair and necessary power, ought vigilantly to guard against its undue increase. It might be answered that this evil might be removed by placing the appointment of the Commissioners in the hands of the courts. But this would not be the effect. The Judicial department, in the aspect of its political weight, was not to be contemned. So long as it remains, as fixed by the Constitution, it will rest for support somewhere—it will naturally ally itself to some other department of the Government, and the inducements to such alliance will be most naturally held out by the Executive; but however peculiar circumstances might at this time indicate otherwise, such a tendency was a kind of political gravity, which, however it might for a time be checked, would eventually exert its influence.

On the other hand, the opponents of the repeal observed that the silence of the public on the subject indicated neither hostility nor opposition to the present system of bankruptcy; if it indicated any prevailing sentiment, it was that of confidence in the judgment of their representatives. If the system really was so unpopular as some gentlemen had represented it to be, their tables would ere this have been covered with memorials for its repeal, whereas not a single petition to that effect had been presented during the session.

They contended that it would be true policy to suffer the act to expire by its own limitation. Little more than two years would elapse before the arrival of that period. This conduct was dictated by the undisputed fact that the present system had been adopted as an experiment. Hence the limitation of the act. This experiment was now in a fair course of trial. Little more than three years had elapsed since its commencement, and sufficient time had not yet passed to test the goodness or the badness of the principle it involved. It was a fact that the distresses of the commercial world called forth such a system when it was formed in the year 1800; it was a fact that it had done much good; and it might be that a system of bankruptcy, improved to the extent of which it was susceptible, would be of permanent utility. Amendments, radical amendments, the system certainly required; and should the House determine not to destroy it, the amendments could and doubtless would be made.

It was believed that the general sentiment of the nation concurred in the propriety of affording some relief to the distresses of the commercial world. On the form and extent of that relief great contrariety of opinion existed. It was the opinion of well informed merchants and of the best writers, that a greater relief should be afforded to the misfortunes of men engaged in trade than in other occupations. To the argument that the proper relief to be extended should be left to the determination of the States, the objection, that the laws of the different States were on this point various and contradictory, was conclusive. Trade, of all human occupations, embraced the widest range. Its operations were confined to no particular State, or climate, but pervaded the whole world. It was of great importance then, if practicable, that laws in relation to it should be equally wide with this extensive range. Though this was utterly impracticable, yet it was practicable to make the same laws pervade a whole nation. Of this opinion were the venerable patriots of 1789, who framed the Constitution; such was the spirit of the Constitution itself; and such its language in speaking of uniform laws respecting imports, bankruptcies, and intercourse between the several States. Not that the power to pass such laws was imperative: but they manifested the sense of that body and the spirit of the instrument, that all laws on those subjects should be uniform throughout the United States.

To the argument, that the exoneration of property from the payment of just debts was a violation of justice, it was replied, that however correct the principle might be in ordinary cases, it did not hold in commercial concerns. In other employments an inability to comply with contracts was generally the result of idleness or imprudence; but so great and inevitable were the risks attendant on commerce, that no human prudence could guard against them.

Of trade, credit was the life; without it, it could not exist. In this country, too, it was the great source of revenue. How politic then was it, in a country where the whole of the revenue, and much of the wealth of its citizens, depended upon trade, to adopt regulations which would repress mercantile exertion and enterprise?

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Bankrupt Law.

H. OF R.

It was contended, that it was not true that the principle of a bankrupt law operated in favor of the debtor; the reverse was the case, and constituted one of the strongest arguments of its superiority to insolvent laws, under which the time of surrender was left to the option of the debtor, whereas, under a bankrupt law, the creditor, whenever he had reason to apprehend the fraud or failure of his debtor, could take out a commission under the bankrupt law; the creditor may arrest the prodigal or unjust career of the debtor; while under the insolvent law, the debtor rarely surrenders his property, until he has squandered nearly the whole, or until he has made a fraudulent transfer of it. Such was the operation of the principle of a good bankrupt system; with regard to the present it was admitted that its provisions were unfair, and operated frequently the other way.

A leading argument in favor of a bankrupt system was that it multiplied checks against fraud; there would of course be less temptation to commit fraud, as the chances of concealing it diminished. In most countries the terrors of an awful punishment awaited the commission of fraud under this act, even the terrors of death. Though it might not be sound policy in this country to make punishments so terrible, yet it was always within the power of the Legislature to make transgressions so penal, as to guard against the apprehended evils.

It was contended that one great object of the Constitution in bestowing this power on the General Government was the establishment of national credit upon the broad principles of justice; such was the effect of the system of bankruptcy by which the same obligations were imposed upon the merchants of all the States in their relation to each other, and towards foreigners. Remove this system, and you virtually re-enact the partial and varying laws of the different States. In Virginia, for instance, the person only of the debtor is liberated, while in Maryland both person and property are liberated. Will not the citizen of one State acquire advantages over the citizen of another, and will not foreigners have reference in their dealings to the laws of the States, and prefer dealing with the citizens of that State where there shall exist the greatest security for the recovery of their debts? Will not the citizen of one State remove into another, and evade the operation of the laws of the State where contracts were made? The friends of the repeal say the bankrupt system is retrospective in its operation. That was true, inasmuch as it changed the relations of debtor and creditor. But what will the repeal do? Contracts have been made under the contemplated existence of the act for a fixed period. By repealing it before that period arrives, you likewise change again the relations of debtor and creditor.]

About four o'clock, the debate being closed, the question on the resolution to repeal, was taken and carried in the affirmative, ayes 94.

The Committee rose, and the House immediately took up their report, on agreeing to which the yeas and nays were required, and were, yeas 99, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun., Nathaniel Alexander, Isaac Anderson, John Archer, Simeon Baldwin, David Bard, George M. Bedinger, Silas Betton, Phaniel Bishop, William Blackledge, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, George W. NAYS—John Campbell, Joseph Clay, Peter Early, William Eustis, Daniel Heister, Benjamin Huger, John G. Jackson, Thomas Lowndes, William McCreery, Nicholas R. Moore, Joseph H. Nicholson, Tompson J. Skinner, John Smith of New York.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. NEWTON, Mr. HAMMOND, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, and Mr. MARMADUKE WILLIAMS, do prepare and bring in the same.

THURSDAY, November 24.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with the desire expressed in the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the fifteenth instant, I now lay before them copies of such documents as are in possession of the Executive, relative to the arrest and confinement of Zachariah Cox, by officers in the service of the United States, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight. From the nature of the transaction, some documents relative to it might have been expected from the War Office; but, if any ever existed there, they were probably lost when the office and its papers were consumed by fire.

Nov. 24, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The said Message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, referred to the committee appointed the second instant, on the memorial and remonstrance of Zachariah Cox.

On motion it was

Resolved, That the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-second instant and this day,

H. OF R.

Amey Darden.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

the petition of sundry residents and purchasers of land in the State of Ohio, and of sundry inhabitants of Fairfield county, in the said State of Ohio, be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States, and report thereon to the House.

Mr. LUCAS, from the committee to whom were referred on the third and eighth instant, the memorials of sundry inhabitants of the two western counties of the Indiana Territory of the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented a bill to repeal an act, entitled "An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

AMEY DARDEN.

On the motion of Mr. CLAIBORNE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Amey Darden. The report is unfavorable to the prayer of the petitioner.

On agreeing to this report, a discussion took place which occupied the greater part of the day. Messrs. J. C. SMITH, GREGG, and MACON supported, and Messrs. CLAIBORNE, SMILIE, and ELLIOT opposed the report; when the question was taken on agreeing to the report of the Committee of Claims and lost, ayes 32.

Mr. CLAIBORNE then moved a resolution, "that the prayer of Amey Darden is reasonable and ought to be granted."

Messrs. CLAIBORNE and NICHOLSON supported, and Messrs. GRISWOLD and GREGG opposed this resolution, which, on the question being taken, was carried, ayes 61, ayes 38.

The Committee then rose, and reported their agreement to the resolution.

Mr. GREGG moved an amendment directing the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to settle the claim of Amey Darden, on the same principle with similar cases, the statute of limitations notwithstanding.

Messrs. GRISWOLD and GREGG supported, and Messrs. NICHOLSON and CLAIBORNE opposed the amendment.

A concurrence in the report was then agreed to, and the Committee of Claims instructed to bring in a bill.

FRIDAY, November 25.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of David Darden, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will adopt such measures, as in their wisdom may be deemed expedient and proper, for extinguishing the Indian claims to lands within the limits of the said State.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. DICKSON, Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jun., Mr. PURVIANCE, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. VAN HORNE, to examine, and report thereupon to the House.

Sundry memorials of the people of the Mississippi Territory of the United States were presented to the House and read, respectively praying a revision and amendment of the laws relative to the sale of lands of the United States, in such manner as that grants for small or moderate portions of unappropriated land may be made to actual settlers, and that similar terms of disposal may be extended to future emigrants; or that such other measures may be adopted by Congress, as will accelerate the settlement and insure the prosperity of the said Territory.—Referred.

A petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, submitting to the consideration of Congress certain propositions of amendment to the act passed the third of March last, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee;" which they pray may be adopted for the benefit of the purchasers of land and other inhabitants within the said Territory.—Referred.

A petition and memorial of sundry inhabitants of the district of Washington, situate on the Mobile, Tombigbee, and Alabama rivers, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying, for the reasons therein specified, that a division of the said Territory may be made, and a separate Government established within and for the said District of Washington.—Referred.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom was referred on the eleventh instant, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of New Shoreham, in the State of Rhode Island, made a report thereon, which was read and considered; Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do concur with the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures in their opinion "that it is not expedient to make provision for allowing the petitioners a bounty for dried fish caught in boats of a smaller capacity than five tons."

Ordered, That the petition of Memucan Hunt, William Polk, and Pleasant Henderson, for themselves and others, addressed to the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina; also, sundry resolutions of the said Assembly, respecting a claim for the value of certain lands in the State of Tennessee, presented to this House on the nineteenth of January, one thousand eight hundred and two, and the report of a select committee thereon, made the twenty-fourth of March, in the same year, be referred to the Committee this day appointed on the memorial of the Legislature of Tennessee.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating the treaty with the Kaskaskia Indians, as ratified by the Senate.

After some conversation on the mode of disposing of this communication, it was, on the motion of Mr. J. RANDOLPH, committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday, in order to give the House an opportunity to exercise its Constitutional right of deciding on the propriety of passing the necessary laws to carry this treaty into effect.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Retrenchment of Expenses.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the States shall be so authenticated as to take effect in each State."

After considerable discussion, developing much diversity of opinion, the Committee rose, and the bill was recommitted to a select committee of nine members.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. NEWTON called for the order of the day on the bill to repeal an act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

Mr. VARNUM moved an amendment, extending the period of repeal to the first of January, 1804, instead of from the passage of the act; and afterwards varied the motion, so as to leave the period of repeal blank.

This motion was supported by Messrs. R. GRISWOLD, EARLY, and SKINNER; and opposed by Messrs. SMILIE, NEWTON, RODNEY, and HASTINGS. Lost—ayes 25.

On motion of Mr. R. GRISWOLD, an amendment was introduced, directing the completion of all proceedings under commissions taken out previous to the repeal.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill with the above amendment, in which the House immediately concurred, and ordered, without a division, the bill to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

[The bill is concise, and is confined to repealing the bankrupt act, saving cases where commissions have been taken out previously to the passage of the act, at which time the repeal takes effect.]

RETRENCHMENT OF EXPENSES.

Mr. EPPES observed, that, when the bill fixing the salaries of certain officers was under the consideration of the House, allusion had been made to the expenses of the several Departments of the Government. As he thought it proper that the Legislature should meet all such in a fair manner, he submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what reduction may be made in the expenses of the different Departments of the Government; and that they report to this House such arrangements as they may think calculated to promote economy, either by the reduction of compensations or contingent expenses in any of the Departments, or by the discontinuance of such offices, or such establishments, as may be dispensed with, without injury to the United States."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved that the resolution should lie on the table. He observed that the same duties enjoined by it on the Committee of Ways and Means had been already devolved on them by the Standing Rules of the House. The resolution seemed to him, therefore, unnecessary. He concluded by moving a postponement of the further consideration of it to the first day of January next.

Mr. EPPES replied, that, although the resolution he had offered embraced some subjects assigned already by the rules of the House to the Committee of Ways and Means, yet, if the wording of it were attended to by the gentleman from Virginia, it would be found that it also embraced subjects that did not belong more to that committee than to any other committee. When he had proposed a resolution a short time since, the object of which was to reduce an establishment, in his opinion useless, it had been submitted to that committee. And in what consists the difference between the nature of that resolution and the one now offered? That was for the reduction of the single expenses of a single Department; this is for taking into consideration the state and expenses of the whole Departments of the Government. When the subject of salaries was before the House, we were told that it did not become us to make a saving in the salaries alone, but that it was proper to take an enlarged view of the whole of the Departments. What does this resolution contemplate? An inquiry into the state and expenses of the whole of the Departments. If this duty had been enjoined already on the Committee of Ways and Means, and they had either omitted or neglected to discharge it, the House was perfectly competent to lay an injunction on them to attend to it. For these reasons, Mr. E. said, he should not consent to the resolution either lying on the table, or being postponed, but should demand either its immediate adoption or rejection.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Far be it from me to question the power of this House to make such disposition of this resolution as they shall see fit. It is a power to which I shall implicitly yield obedience. But, with that freedom which belongs to every member of the House, and which I shall always exercise, without any consideration of the quarter from which a motion comes, I shall use that degree of understanding with which it has pleased God to invest me, in forming a judgment of the course proper to be pursued on this as well as on every other occasion. My colleague does not take the distinction between a general and a specific resolution. It would be arrogating merit, which I do not deserve—a merit which I disclaim—to assume that my judgment is more clear or comprehensive than that of my colleague; and yet, my mind does perceive the widest difference between the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means of a general and of a specific proposition. It is the general duty of that committee, according to the Standing Rules of the House, "to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of money, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments, and the accountability of their officers."

This (if I may use the term) is a power of attorney by which the committee is authorized to act. If, therefore, any gentleman lay upon the table a resolution, which, to my poor judgment, appears to be a mere transcript of one already in existence, I shall be compelled to say that it seems to me to be either unnecessary, or to imply a censure on the manner in which the committee have discharged their functions. Does it follow, that, because a specific resolution is laid on the table respecting one Department in which there may be an abuse, or wherein a specific retrenchment of expense may be made, that thence there is a necessity to call the attention of the committee to all the objects within the sphere of their duties—that it is necessary for the House to go over the whole of their duties, and call them generally to a discharge of them? Therefore, when the gentleman called our attention to a particular source of expense—to a particular object—I thought the resolution in order, and voted for its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. So, if he had laid on the table a string of resolutions calling the attention of the House and of the committee to certain specific objects of expense, I should have had no objection to referring them to that committee, unless, while the resolutions purported to specify particular objects, they embraced the whole duties of the committee. The gentleman says he calls upon the House, and demands an instantaneous adoption or rejection of the resolution. I presume, that, when any gentleman lays a resolution upon the table, his object is, that it shall be disposed of in such manner as shall be consonant with the rules of the House, or as the House may think proper.

Mr. EPPES rose to explain. He did not intend to prescribe the particular disposition which the House should make of the resolution, but had said that he would not consent to its postponement, or that it should lie on the table.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman presses an immediate rejection or adoption of the resolution. To prevent an immediate decision of resolutions offered, I presume, the rules were established directing that they should lie on the table, or admitting of their postponement; and of that rule I wish to avail myself on this occasion. Let me ask, with what view instruct the committee generally as to the performance of duties already enjoined? If with a view to censure, as the gentleman seemed to intimate, let the gentleman bring forward a fair and open resolution of censure, and not aim at producing this effect in a side way. To what purpose give the committee this instruction, unless the House think they have neglected their duties? I will ask, if there is anything in this stage of the session that will warrant such a conclusion? I will ask if this, instead of being so early a day, were the last of the session, whether it would not be the fair and honorable conclusion, that the committee had adverted to the duties they had to perform; and, having made no report, had found that there existed no necessity of a reform, or a further accountability of the departments? For these reasons, I shall vote for a postponement of this resolution to the first day of January next; and shall form my opinion of every resolution that shall come before this House, without reference to the quarter from which it shall proceed, according to the degree of judgment with which it has pleased Heaven to invest me, and shall exercise the right of expressing my sentiments freely, and in a manner most congenial to my habits and temper.

Mr. GREGG hoped the gentleman who had offered this resolution would agree to let it lie on the table. He was himself, at first, induced to think with the gentleman that, from the remarks which had fallen on both sides of the House, on the bill respecting salaries, such an inquiry as that at present proposed would be highly proper, and had himself contemplated the offering a similar resolution. But, on further inquiry, he had found that, by the existing rules of the House, the Committee of Ways and Means were already fully instructed to make the necessary inquiries; and he thought that such a resolution, under those circumstances, would wear the appearance of censure on that committee. It was known to the House that that committee had much and important business submitted to them. They had already done much business, and much, he understood, was in a state of preparation. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution would be suffered to lie on the table; and that, at some future day, it would be called up, in case the committee did not, in the interim, pay a due attention to the duties enjoined on them.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I am persuaded that the gentleman who offered this resolution did not intend, in the most distant manner, to censure the Committee of Ways and Means. I, as a member of that committee, do not feel that the least censure was intended or is deserved. Nor do I think that this would be the effect of the resolution if adopted by the House. It is true, that one part of the resolution contemplates objects embraced in the general rules; but it is also true that it embraces other objects, not mentioned in the rules. It is more than probable that it was to these last particular objects that the gentleman meant to direct the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means. I allude to that part of the resolution that contemplates the discontinuance of such offices or establishments as are useless. The rule of the House does not empower the committee, in express terms, to make such an inquiry, though I have no doubt that that object is substantially embraced by the spirit of it. The powers of the Committee of Ways and Means were materially changed at the beginning of the seventh Congress. They were then empowered "To examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers."

Retrenchment of Expenses.

H. OF R.

This power was ingrafted on the previous powers of that committee, from a bill that originated with the committee usually styled the Committee of Investigation. The bill was introduced to destroy the two offices of the Accountants of the War and Navy Departments; and the title of it was transfused into the standing rules of the House. It is extremely probable that the gentleman who has offered this resolution, as well as other gentlemen, had no idea of the extent of the powers given to the Committee of Ways and Means. Under this view, I do not think the resolution will answer any useful purpose, as the Committee of Ways and Means have already the same duties devolved upon them which it assigns. I am convinced the same gentlemen who offered it will have no objection to its postponement till the 1st of January; and, in the meantime, the Committee of Ways and Means will, if they see fit, make the inquiry which appears to be the object of it.

MR. RODNEY.—With my friend from Virginia, (MR. RANDOLPH,) I will, on all occasions, exercise an independent judgment on any proposition submitted to the House, without regard to the quarter from which it may come, and, with my friend from Maryland, (MR. NICHOLSON,) I am satisfied that the idea of censuring the Committee of Ways and Means was the most remote from the intention of my friend from Virginia, (MR. EPPES,) from his known character. I shall consider, then, this resolution, as well as all others, on its merits alone. Three objections have been raised against it; first, that it implies a censure upon the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I am a member; secondly, that the subjects to which it relates are already before that committee; and, thirdly, it is required that it lie on the table for consideration. As to the first objection, I shall put it out of the question, as I am satisfied such an idea as that of censuring the committee never entered the imagination of the gentleman who moved the resolution; and as no such idea can be collected from the expressions of the gentleman, or appears on the face of the resolution. As a member of that committee, I am not sensible of its implying any censure, though, I trust, I should be as much alive as any other member of the committee to the imputation of censure.

As to the second objection to the resolution, that it assigns duties already devolved by the rules of the House, it may be true that all the duties imposed by the resolution are embraced by the rules; but, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I shall always feel thankful to any member for calling to my view any specific duties which that committee ought to perform. I shall never be offended by the call of any gentleman upon me to discharge my duty. It is true, that we have certain duties assigned us by the House, for the performance of which we may be said, in the language of the gentleman from Virginia, to be the attorney of the House; but, I think, if I may use the expression, the fee simple resides in the House; and it is not only the right, but the duty of any member to call any committee to the discharge of the duties assigned it. I feel, therefore, no objection to the resolution on this score. The same course has been pursued in the other resolution offered by the same gentleman; and though, in that case, it was a particular duty to which the attention of the committee was called, yet I do not consider that there is any solidity in the distinction attempted to be drawn by my learned friend from Virginia, between specific and general propositions. If there is any distinction, it is so slight that I am unable to perceive it. As the original resolution offered by my friend from Virginia, called the attention of the committee to a specific point, so does this. It does not call upon the committee to discharge all the duties devolved upon them, but invites their attention to particular points of duty; and though we may, by the standing rules of the House, be empowered to make an inquiry on the same subjects, yet, as this resolution directs us specifically to particular points, I shall consider it my special duty to attend to them, if it shall pass.

For these reasons, said Mr. R., I consider the resolution in every point of view correct. As to a postponement, I have no objection, with the consent of the gentleman who moved the resolution, to postpone it to a distant day, not however so distant as January.

MR. NICHOLSON.—I think the resolution useless, and if the question now before us was, whether we should agree or disagree to it, I should give it my negative, that the House may preserve some consistency in their proceedings. I will call the attention of gentlemen to the fate of several resolutions, offered two years since, from a certain quarter of the House, calling the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to the expediency of reducing the duties on brown sugar, coffee, and bohea tea. They were then rejected, on the ground that the previous general powers conferred on that committee involved power to inquire on that specific proposition. If now we adopt this resolution, coming from another quarter of the House, we shall not preserve consistency of conduct. I hope gentlemen, from a regard to consistency, will agree to postpone this resolution.

The question was then taken on a postponement of the resolution, to the first day of January, and lost—ayes 37, noes 61.

MR. SMILIE considered it improper to pass a resolution of so much importance so hastily. He moved a postponement to the first Monday of December.

MR. STANFORD moved an adjournment of the House. Lost—ayes 45, noes 55.

MR. S. then moved a postponement to the third Monday of December. Lost, without a division.

The motion of MR. SMILIE, to postpone the resolution to the first Monday of December, was then agreed to—ayes 72.

MR. VARNUM then moved that the resolution offered by MR. EPPES should be printed for the use of the members.

MR. J. RANDOLPH moved for printing, in connexion with the resolution, the standing rules of the House respecting the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means.

MONDAY, November 28.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, enclosing his annual report respecting post roads which have been established within the United States more than two years, and have not, in the second or last year, produced one-third part of the expense of carrying the mail on the same for such year; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the eighteenth ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made to the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States."

A petition of sundry residents and claimants of lands on the Alabama river, and on the east side of the river and bay of Mobile, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying, for the reasons therein specified, a repeal of so much of the eighth section of an act, passed the third of March last, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," as provides that no certificate shall be granted for lands lying east of the Tombigbee river; or that such modification and amendment of the said act may be made, as Congress in their wisdom shall deem expedient and proper.—Referred.

Mr. EARLY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the second instant, the remonstrance and memorial of Zachariah Cox, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

An engrossed bill to repeal an act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PUBLIC ROADS.

On the call of Mr. JACKSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following resolution:

"Resolved, That provision be made, by law, for the application of one twentieth part of the net proceeds of the land lying within the State of Ohio, sold, or to be sold by Congress, from and after the 30th day of June, 1802, to the laying out, and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio river, and to the said State of Ohio: in conformity with the acts of Congress, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form a constitution, and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and for other purposes," passed upon the 30th April, 1802, as well as the act passed the 3d of March, 1804, in addition to and in modification of the propositions contained in the act aforesaid; and the ordinance of the convention of the State of Ohio, bearing date the 29th day of November, 1802."

Mr. JACKSON called for the reading of the acts of Congress which were referred to in the resolution; which was done: he then moved that the Committee rise and report their agreement.

Mr. VARNUM said he hoped the question would be taken separately on the resolution.

Mr. JACKSON hoped that gentlemen opposed to the resolution would rise at that time and express their opinions.

Mr. NICHOLSON was opposed to the resolution, but was prevented from indisposition from expressing his sentiments; he would do it at a future period.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH was sorry that the indisposition of his friend from Maryland should prevent him from delivering his sentiments on this occasion. He was himself unprepared to speak on this question, but it appeared to him, from a complete view of the subject some time since, that the resolutions contravened one of the provisions of the law to which it was referred; by reverting to that law, it would be found that in one of the propositions offered by Congress to the State of Ohio, it was provided that one twentieth part of the net proceeds, arising from the sale of lands in that State, should be laid out in roads to and from it, and laid out under the direction of Congress. The State of Ohio agreed to adopt the propositions if Congress would make an amendment, (which he read.) He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the facts and wished them to attend to the different propositions. He should not have troubled the Committee but from an apprehension that when gentlemen had taken up an opinion, they were loth to abandon it. One of the propositions of Congress was, that one-twentieth part of the net proceeds arising from the sale of lands in the State of Ohio should be laid out under the direction of Congress in the making of roads from the Atlantic to that State. The State of Ohio agrees to the proposition with this amendment, that not less than three per cent. should be laid out exclusively in that State, under the direction of their Legislature. He conceived that the last proposition was only a modification of the former, and that the three per cent. was a part of the five, and not an additional allowance; if the latter had been intended, why, he asked, was it not so expressed? There were several other propositions and they were stated to be amendments. He considered Congress never intended to grant more than five per cent., and should therefore vote against the resolutions.

Mr. JACKSON differed with gentlemen who considered the three per cent. as a part of the five; he considered it as an addition, and he hoped he should be able to convince the Committee of it. In order to do this, it would be necessary to read a number of documents on the subject; they were lengthy, but the subject was important, and he conceived them necessary in order to decide correctly on the subject. Here Mr. JACKSON read a number of documents on the subject, and observed that he conceived that the State of Ohio expected that the three per cent. was in addition to the five; if the last proposition was to be taken as a modification of the former, then the three per cent. was to be taken in lieu of the five; if however, it was in addition to it, then the three per cent. was to be added to the five. If they would recur (Mr. J. said) to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be found that he was in favor of ten per cent.; but Congress were for five. If the Legislature of Ohio were for taking three per cent. to be laid out under their own direction, instead of five to be laid out under the direction of Congress, they would so have expressed it; and if Congress intended it, they were bound so to express themselves; but they intended no such thing. If the proposition was of a doubtful nature, and it appeared to be so from the arguments of his colleague, he begged leave to recommend to the Committee a liberal construction; we ought, he said, to extend a fostering hand to our western brethren; the people of the western country are attached to the Government, but if we do not extend to them the fostering hand, he could not say how long they would be so.

NOVEMBER, 1803.

Public Roads.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD apprehended there could be no doubt as to the construction which Congress gave to the law in question; there might be some doubt whether that construction was a sound one, he however thought it perfectly so. In the year 1801, Congress provided that one-twentieth part of the net proceeds arising from the sale of lands in the State of Ohio should be applied to making roads to that State, under the direction of Congress. The proposition was laid before the State of Ohio. The Convention of Ohio agreed to it, provided Congress would consent to a modification of it; they wished some part of the five per cent. to be laid out exclusively in their own State and under the direction of their own Legislature; they therefore proposed that three per cent. should be laid out in the State, and under the direction of the Legislature of Ohio. If the State of Ohio had intended that the three per cent. was to be added to the five, they would have stated it (as in the other propositions) to be in addition to it. The committee which were on the subject last session, gave the law the same construction which he did, and the House concurred in that construction. He thought they were under no obligation to lay out more money than they had agreed to do, and if the committee would attend to the subject they could be under no difficulty to determine the construction. We had an appropriation of two per cent. to make, and perhaps it might be necessary to pass a law to that effect; but he could not consent to give any more.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL would beg the indulgence of the Committee while he said a few words on the subject before them. As he should vote in favor of the resolution on the table, he conceived that when they were about to determine on the construction of a law, they were only to refer to the face of it, and not to inquire what the framers of it meant. He begged leave to read the law on the subject, and said that the law of Congress concerning five per cent. was in force unless repealed by another law; and the subsequent law which provided for the laying out of three per cent. in roads, was either in addition to or a repeal of it; he believed that it was an addition to it. It could not be the intention of the Convention of Ohio to accept of three per cent. to be laid out in their own State, and under the direction of their own Legislature, in lieu of five per cent. to be laid out under the direction of Congress. He should, considering the appropriations to be distinct ones, vote in favor of the resolutions.

Mr. RODNEY deemed it necessary to make but few observations after the able arguments of his friend from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) and the luminous observations of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) against the resolutions. The question to be determined, was, whether the five per cent. was to be given exclusive of the three? It had been said that they ought not to consider the intention of those who framed the law, but he conceived it to be proper, in order to give a right construction. When they reverted to the propositions themselves, they would find one of them was, that provided the State of Ohio would not for a limited time tax the lands of the United States, that then one-twentieth part of the net proceeds arising from the sale of lands in that State should be laid out in making roads to the State of Ohio, the same to be laid out under the direction of Congress. When this proposition, came before the Convention of Ohio, they said that three per cent. ought to be laid out exclusively in their own State and under the direction of their Legislature. This could only be intended as a modification of the law. He did not think there was any difficulty in determining the construction of the law, and should vote against the resolution.

Mr. VARNUM conceived that the construction given to the law by the gentlemen from Virginia, Connecticut, and Delaware, was perfectly correct. He did not know whether it would be necessary to make an appropriation of the remaining two per cent. during this session, but in order to try the principle, he moved to strike out of the resolution the words one-twentieth and insert one-fiftieth.

Mr. SANDFORD had not intended to have troubled the Committee on this occasion, but being a Representative from the West, it might be expected that he might be in favor of the resolution. But he did not conceive that more than five per cent. was ever intended to be given, and this was not a question of expediency. He did not believe that the Convention of Ohio intended that the three per cent. should be given in addition to the five, nor had they any reason to expect it. This ought not to be an Eastern and a Western question. If the five per cent. were now given, Mr. S. asked whether it would not operate for the benefit of the rest of the States as well as the State of Ohio? But, as they must determine not what Congress ought to give, but what they meant to give, and he conceived that three per cent. was a part of the five, he should therefore vote against the resolution.

Mr. LYON spoke in favor of the resolution, at some length.

Mr. MACON did not think it necessary to say anything on the construction of the law, because he conceived that the arguments of the two first gentlemen who opposed the resolution (Messrs. J. RANDOLPH and R. GRISWOLD) to be unanswerable; but as the question appeared to be made an Eastern and a Western one, he would say a few words. He considered the whole United States concerned in it, and not merely the State of Ohio. He believed that the arguments of gentlemen that they had not done justice to the State of Ohio were groundless. There was no State in the Union which has been so much favored as that State. He was sorry gentlemen had used threats on the occasion, that if they did not grant this, they might not be attached to the Union; but he believed that the State of Ohio would be the greatest loser by it. He was willing to leave it to the Western people themselves to determine, whether Congress had not done them justice, and he was certain they would answer in the affirmative.

Mr. BOYLE did not consider this a question of party nor of expediency; not what Congress ought to give, but what they had given. If the construction of the law was difficult to determine, it ought to be taken against the United States and favorable to the State of Ohio, because Congress was the grantor and that State the grantee. This was the manner in which private contracts were always construed, and he thought it a sound one. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH) had said that the three per cent. was not intended to be given in addition to the five, because it was not so expressed; but Mr. B. said, the last law was not said to be a modification, the construction was therefore doubtful and ought to be taken favorable to the State of Ohio.

Mr. GODDARD did not think they were under any difficulty in determining the true construction of the law in question. He considered it to admit of but one construction; this appeared to him to be a negotiation between Congress and the State of Ohio. It was proposed by the former, that if the latter would not tax their lands for a limited time, the one-twentieth part of the net proceeds should be laid out in making roads for that State under the direction of Congress; the State of Ohio acceded to it, provided three per cent. should be laid out exclusively in that State, and Congress agreed to it; this appeared to him to be the true state of the case.

Mr. SMILE would make one observation on the subject. He believed it to be a good rule, when any subject was to be examined, to look at the intention of the parties; he never conceived that it was the intention of Congress to give to the State of Ohio more than five per cent., nor did he believe any gentleman, a member of Congress at the time the law passed, had any such intention.

Mr. JACKSON moved that the Committee rise.—Lost without a division.

Mr. MORROW would beg the indulgence of the Committee while he made a few observations on the subject. He was sorry this was made a party question. He read the report of the committee of Congress and the propositions of Congress to the State of Ohio; and observed that when the propositions came before the Convention, they were pleased with them, but did not consider that the five per cent., which was to be laid out in roads, was an equivalent for what they asked: which was, that the State of Ohio should not for a limited time tax the lands of Congress. How, said Mr. M., gentlemen would ask, was this known? He would answer, by an estimate of the value of both; therefore they agreed to the propositions, provided Congress would make an amendment, and allow them an additional three per cent. to be laid out exclusively in their own State and under the direction of their Legislature; to this Congress agreed. He conceived the question for them to determine, whether the three was in addition to or in lieu of the five; he believed it could not be the latter, because it would go to defeat the original design, which was facilitating the communication between the Eastern and Western States. He was in favor of the resolution believing that it was the intention of the Convention of Ohio, at the time they agreed to the propositions, that the three per cent. was to be given in addition to the five.

The question was taken on Mr. VARNUM's motion to strike out one-twentieth and insert one-fiftieth and carried—yeas 75.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, and carried without a division.

TUESDAY, November 29.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," were read, and, together with the bill, ordered to be committed to Messrs. EUSTIS, J. CLAY, MCCREERY, DANA, and HASBROUCK.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to examine the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, made a farther report, in part, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating an appendix to the information heretofore given on the subject of Louisiana. The said Message was read, and, together with the appendix transmitted therewith, referred to the committee appointed on the twenty-seventh of October last on so much of the President's Message of the twenty-first of the same month as relates "to permanent arrangements for the government of Louisiana."

The amendment of the Senate to the bill making provision for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States, were referred to a select committee.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on Mr. JACKSON's resolution making an appropriation of a certain part of the proceeds of lands, sold in Ohio, to the making public roads, and agreed to it without a division. After which several verbal amendments were made, and the resolution thus amended referred to a committee to bring in a bill.

Mr. DAWSON called for the order of the day on two resolutions, some time since offered, respecting post roads.

AMEY DARDEN.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called for the order of the day on the bill for the relief of Amey Darden.

The motion of Mr. DAWSON being lost, there being only thirty-two ayes in favor of it, Mr. CLAIBORNE's motion was taken up.

Mr. SANFORD moved to postpone the order of the day on the bill for the relief of Amey Darden till to-morrow, in order to introduce a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for adjusting the claims of individuals for supplies furnished and services rendered during the Revolutionary war, with the view of trying previously to the granting individual relief the general principle, whether Congress would repeal the statutes of limitation.

After a debate of considerable length, the motion to postpone was lost.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, which was so amended as to allow Amey Darden two thousand five hundred dollars for the horse Romulus, being the estimated value thereof, not including interest.

The Committee reported the bill so amended.

The question was then taken on two thousand five hundred dollars, and decided in the negative by the vote of the SPEAKER.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to fill the blank with two thousand three hundred and twenty dollars, being the amount of principal and interest on the value of the horse.

Mr. SANFORD moved to fill it with one thousand dollars.

The House agreed to Mr. NICHOLSON's motion—ayes 58, noes 43.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the engrossing of the bill for a third reading—yeas 57, nays 49, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, November 30.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and other papers, transmitted from the counties of Greenbriar and Rockbridge, in the State of Virginia, respecting the contested election of THOMAS LEWIS, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jr., from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the legal representatives of David Darden, deceased, was read the third time; and on the question that the said bill do pass, there appeared—yeas 58, nays 57. And Mr. SPEAKER having declared himself with the nays, the said question was, in conformity with the rules of the House, decided in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

THURSDAY, December 1.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the said amendments, ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the sixteenth ultimo, on the memorial of Paul Coulon, a French citizen; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the farther consideration thereof, and that the said report and memorial be recommended to the Committee of Claims.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the twenty-eighth ultimo, on the remonstrance and memorial of Zachariah Cox; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the resolution contained therein.

Ordered, That the consideration of the said report and resolution be postponed until Monday next.

Ordered, That the memorial and petition of the Illinois and Ouabache Land Companies, which was read and ordered to lie on the table on the twenty-seventh of October last, be referred to Mr. LEIB, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. SANDFORD, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. MCCORD, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Message from the President of the United States, of the twenty-fifth ultimo, enclosing a treaty lately concluded between the United States and the Kaskaskia tribe of Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions thereon; which were, severally, twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for carrying into effect the treaty concluded at Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory, on the thirteenth of August, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States of America and the Kaskaskia tribe of Indians.

2. Resolved, That the committee appointed, on the twenty-second of November last, on the petitions of sundry residents in the State of Ohio, be authorized and directed to report by bill, or otherwise, the provisions for carrying the said treaty into effect, and on our other concerns with the Indian tribes.

FRIDAY, December 2.

Another member, to wit: JOHN DENNIS, from Maryland, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed the twenty-second of November last, who were directed by a resolution of the House, of the twenty-fourth of the same month, "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made a report, in part, thereupon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second of October last, presented a bill to reduce the Marine Corps of the United States;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

BENJAMIN WELLS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Benjamin Wells, which is as follows:

"The object of the petitioner is to obtain indemnification for the losses he sustained by the insurrection in the western counties of Pennsylvania, in the year 1794. These were estimated by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, under the act of Congress passed the 27th of February, 1795, at one thousand two hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents; on account of which, there was advanced to the petitioner, by Government, the sum of eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents, for which he is held responsible by the terms of the act just mentioned.

"If your committee entertained the opinion, that the Government is bound to make reparation for damages occasioned by rioters or insurgents, still they would not be disposed to admit the report of the commissioners in the present instance, as conclusive evidence of the just amount of those damages. It is very obvious that, with the best possible intentions to do complete justice, they were exposed, in an ex parte inquiry, to various impositions, from the representations of their losses by the parties interested.

"From the best information your committee can obtain, they are satisfied that the sum already received from the Government by the petitioner, must be viewed as an adequate compensation for the actual destruction of property he has sustained. To exonerate him from further liability, to refund this sum, would, it is believed, under all the peculiar circumstances of the case, be an act of justice as well as of liberal policy. And, as there are other sufferers from the same unfortunate transactions, to whom similar advances have been made, your committee are of opinion that relief should be extended to all, under one general provision. They, therefore, respectfully submit to the House the following resolution, to wit:

“Resolved, That the officers of Government and other citizens to whom moneys were advanced by the President of the United States, pursuant to a law passed the twenty-seventh day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled “An act to provide some present relief to the officers of Government, and other citizens, who have suffered in their property by the insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania,” ought to be exonerated from any future responsibility for the moneys so advanced to them respectively.”

Messrs. J. C. SMITH, SMILIE, and FINDLEY, supported, and Mr. CLAIBORNE opposed the report.

The report was agreed to—ayes 64, noes 24.

The Committee rose and reported the report of the Committee of Claims without amendment.

Mr. JACKSON moved a postponement of the further consideration of the report until Monday.

Messrs. JACKSON, HOLLAND, and CLAIBORNE, supported, and Messrs. J. C. SMITH and SMILIE opposed the postponement, which was lost.

The House then concurred in the report of the Committee, and directed a bill to be brought in.

STEPHEN KINGSTON.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petition of Stephen Kingston, which is unfavorable to the prayer of the petitioner.

Messrs. MITCHELL, J. CLAY, and R. GRISWOLD, opposed the report.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved that the Committee should rise, in order to have the report recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. J. CLAY and S. L. MITCHELL, and lost.

The Committee then non-concurred in the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures—ayes 43, noes 57.

The Committee then rose, and the House agreed to their report.

Mr. J. CLAY then moved a resolution, “that the prayer of the petition of Stephen Kingston ought to be granted.”

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved a recommitment of the report to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. Lost—ayes 25.

The House then agreed to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Monday.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and other papers, transmitted from the county of Montgomery, in the State of North Carolina. —21

rolina, respecting the contested election of SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing his report on a petition, in the French language, of sundry inhabitants of Post Saint Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory of the United States, referred to him by order of the House, on the second of March last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting information that all differences with Morocco had been amicably adjusted.

The said Message, and the papers transmitted therewith, were read, and referred to Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. DENNIS, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. GILLESPIE, and Mr. LOWNDES, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of the officers of the Government, and other citizens, who suffered in their property by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania; which was received, read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that when the City of Washington was laid out, a considerable portion of ground was surrendered by the proprietors to the Commissioners, for the purpose of providing for public walks and gardens, it being considered that when the population of the city should be advanced they would contribute to the health and convenience of the inhabitants. This ground was at present in a waste state; neither productive of profit nor embellishment. By putting it in a state of cultivation, it might contribute to the convenience of the inhabitants as well as of the members of Congress. This might be effected by leasing it for a number of years to one or more persons, on condition of their laying out the rent in its improvement. Mr. N. said he was unwilling to expend any public money on this object, but he believed it might be effected without expense. He therefore moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the present situation of the grounds in the City of Washington, which were appropriated for the purpose of laying out public walks and gardens, and to report such measures to this House as may tend to carry into effect the original intention of the proprietors by whom the said lands were granted for public use.

Agreed to without a division, and referred to Messrs. NICHOLSON, S. L. MITCHELL, CUTLER, ANDERSON, and J. SMITH of Virginia.

A message was received from the Senate, advising that they had passed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the election of a President and Vice President; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

DECEMBER, 1803.*

Mr. HUGER moved the commitment to the same committee of a proposition of amendment to the Constitution by the Legislature of New York, directing the establishment of electoral districts throughout the United States, on the ground of connexion between it and the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS, though in favor of electoral districts, was averse to blending in one proposition two distinct amendments.

The question on commitment was lost—yeas 44, nays 50.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of granting further time to the proprietors of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same, and report their opinion thereon to this House.

Ordered, That Mr. VAN HORNE, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. J. TRIGG, Mr. SAMMONS, and Mr. TENNEY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

THE POST OFFICE.

On the motion of Mr. R. GRISWOLD, the following resolution was taken into consideration:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to prepare and report to this House a statement of the gross sum received in each State for the postage of letters, packets, and newspapers, in the years 1801, 1802, and 1803, respectively, together with the sums which have been paid in each year, and in each State, for commissions to postmasters, for carrying the mail, and for all other expenses in relation to the Post Office, in each State, respectively.

Mr. VARNUM inquired what was the object of the resolution? If the information it requested was important, he had no objection to calling for it. It appeared to him it could not be had without considerable expense and the loss of much time.

A short debate then took place on the resolution.

By Mr. R. GRISWOLD it was contended that the information desired was important; that with regard to the expenditures of all public moneys, it was important that that House and the nation should be acquainted with the details; that there were propositions before the House for applying the surplus proceeds of the Post Office establishment to the making and repairing of roads, and that it appeared in the first instance to be intended to commence the application to roads near the seat of Government; hence the propriety of knowing, before this object was decided on, the amount of revenue drawn from the different States, in order to determine where, if at all, it should be laid out. The information would also be useful, inasmuch as it would exhibit the progress of business in different quarters of the Union, indicated by the increased receipts of the Post Office establishment.

Messrs. J. RANDOLPH and DAWSON also supported the resolution, on the ground that full information should be laid before Congress and the public of the application of all public moneys.

Messrs. VARNUM and GREGG opposed the resolution, on the ground of the great trouble it would impose on the Postmaster General to comply with it, and the expense that would unavoidably attend it. They acquiesced in the resolution so far as it respected obtaining the expenses generally, but objected to that part which required a statement of the receipts and expenses in each State. With regard to the propositions before the House for applying the surplus receipts of the Department to repairing or making roads, it was very doubtful whether they would receive the approbation of Congress. So far, therefore, as this resolution was predicated upon them, it was altogether premature.

Mr. GREGG moved to strike out the parts in italic, which required a statement of the receipts and expenses in each State.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved the taking the yeas and nays on the motion; which, being taken, were—yeas 19, nays 95, as follows:

STATE BALANCES.

Mr. RODNEY called for the order of the day on his resolution to extinguish the State balances.

Mr. EARLY moved a postponement of the further consideration of the subject to the first Monday in January, assigning for reason the unrepresented situation of the State of New Jersey, a creditor State to a considerable amount.

Mr. RODNEY replied.

Mr. HUGER supported the motion for postponement.

Mr. RODNEY said, his solicitude that this business should be considered at an early day arose from his fear that, otherwise, it would, as it had been the last session, be deferred till the close of the session, and then, from the interference of other objects, be got rid of. But as gentlemen were anxious that New Jersey should be represented on that floor previously to a discussion of this business, he would give a pledge of his desire that the decision should be made with fairness, by acquiescing in the postponement.

The question of postponement was then carried—yeas 82.

TUESDAY, December 6.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the amendment to the Constitution, received from the Senate, was called for.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—The House of Representatives some time since passed a resolution, amendatory of the Constitution, and sent it to the Senate for their concurrence. Of this resolution the Senate have taken no notice, but have sent us a different resolution on the same subject. This proceeding is, I think, unprecedented and unpatriotic; and I think we ought not to decide upon this resolution until the Senate shall have answered our resolution. I move, therefore, a postponement of the resolution from the Senate, until to-morrow.

Mr. ELLIOT hoped the consideration of the resolution from the Senate would not be postponed until to-morrow. How far it was proper to impeach the correctness of the course pursued by that body, it was not for him to say. Should they, on any occasion, invade the rights or the dignity of that House, no member would be found more ready to repel the invasion. In this case the Senate have sent us a proposition, embracing the same principle contained in our amendment, with other principles. He hoped, therefore, the House would immediately proceed to give the subject that attention which its intrinsic merits deserved.

Mr. DAWSON only rose to correct the gentleman from Connecticut as to precedent. It must be in the recollection of every gentleman on the floor, that the Senate have frequently sent us bills on the same subject with bills sent by us to them.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD wished the gentleman from Virginia would name an instance. He never knew a bill sent to the Senate, which they neglected acting on, and in the room of which sent one of their own.

The question was then taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion, and lost—yeas 32.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—I will submit another motion, to wit; that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate. My grounds for this motion are these;—that this resolution has not been transmitted to us by a Constitutional number of Senators, and therefore, that the House cannot act upon it.

Mr. DAWSON inquired if the motion were in order.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was in order.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—The principle, I assume, is that this resolution has not passed the Senate by a Constitutional majority of that branch of the Legislature. By a certificate, obtained from the Secretary of that body, it appears that the resolution was passed by the votes of twenty-two members in favor of it; twenty-two voting in the affirmative, and ten in the negative. It is known to every gentleman that the Senate consists of thirty-four members, and that it consequently requires twenty-three to constitute two-thirds of its members. The principle, I assume, is, that it requires two-thirds of the members of each House to pass a resolution proposing to alter the Constitution. The article of the Constitution on this point is the fifth. It is thus expressed: "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution." The question is, what is here meant by a House? Is it merely a majority of the Senators or Representatives; or is it the whole and entire number? To decide this point, we must refer to other parts of the Constitution where the word House is used. I hope gentlemen will critically attend to the words used, and from that attention form their opinions. The third section of the first article is thus expressed: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State." Two Senators then from each State are declared to constitute a Senate. A Senate of the United States cannot, therefore, be composed but of two Senators from each State. One House referred to in the fifth article is the Senate. If then it be necessary that there should be two members from each State to compose a Senate, the House of the Senate cannot be composed but of two members from each State. This is corroborated by other parts of the Constitution. In the fifth section of the first article, it is said, "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business." A majority of each—Of what?—Of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business. The expression is a fair commentary on the other section which I have read: "A majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business." The inference is that the Constitution, when it declares that "the Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution," requires that the proposing them shall be made by two-thirds of the whole number of members constituting the Senate.

There are cases in the Constitution where the concurrence of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature is required for the performance of certain acts, which is a further commentary on this article of the Constitution. In the case of impeachments it is provided that the Senate shall try all impeachments; but no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. The word present is introduced. For what purpose, if it was not the opinion of the framers of the Constitution, that without it, two-thirds of all the members of the body would be necessary to a conviction?

The same expression is used in the case of treaties. The President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Why use here this expression, "two-thirds of the Senators present," unless it was considered necessary to qualify the expression, from the conviction that otherwise it would mean two-thirds of the whole body?

On this ground I apprehend that this resolution has not come constitutionally before us. It has not passed the Senate with the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole body. It has only received the votes of twenty-two Senators, which do not make two-thirds. I, therefore, move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of it.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—There are frequent occasions on which it is necessary to answer doctrines advanced, not on account of their intrinsic merit, but on account of the weight of character of those by whom they are advanced. This is one of those cases. Had the arguments delivered to-day by the gentleman from Connecticut fallen from a less respectable quarter, I should have deemed them unworthy of reply, and have satisfied myself with a silent vote.

The gentleman, with an ingenuity peculiarly unfortunate, has quoted the very clauses and sections of the Constitution which disprove the opinions he has advanced. To these I beg the attention of the House for a moment. He has attempted to sustain the position that two-thirds of both Houses must imply two-thirds of the whole number of each House respectively. If I have misstated the gentleman, I beg to be corrected [Mr. R. here paused.] As there is no disposition to correct my statement, I presume I am correct. If this be the case, are we at this moment a House? If the term House means the whole number of members, can there be a House unless the whole number are present? Can there, therefore, be a House or a Senate so long as a single member is absent?

But it is said that the Constitution, wisely foreseeing this dilemma, has provided that a majority of each House, shall constitute a quorum to do business. Now, I ask, is a majority a quorum or a House? If it is not a House, but merely a quorum, it will be absolutely necessary that we alter our language as well as our journals, and say, not that the House, but a quorum met to transact business, &c.

"Each House may determine the rules of its 'proceedings, punish its members for disorderly 'behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, 'expel a member.'" Will the gentleman hold, on this floor, that it requires two-thirds of the whole body to expel a disorderly member? Will he deny that two-thirds of those present may expel in such a case, and that they are competent in all cases mentioned in the Constitution? I will call the attention of the House to a fact. The session before the last, the House passed an amendment to the Constitution, similar in principle to the present, by the votes of two-thirds of the members present; when, too, there was little more than a bare quorum present. I might answer the doctrine, advanced this day, by saying the practice under the Constitution is already settled. I might ask the gentlemen where was this Constitutional objection then? Why was it then permitted to do so unconstitutional an act, when there was but a bare quorum? I should be glad to receive to these questions a satisfactory answer.

"Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, 'excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the mem'bers of either House on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.' Now, according to the doctrine of the gentleman, unless the whole body is present, the yeas and nays cannot be entered, because there is no House unless all the members are present.

The gentleman inquires why the Constitution has so sedulously directed that in certain cases the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present shall be required. For an obvious reason. The Constitution could not ascertain the number of which the two Houses would consist, from their varying numbers, and, therefore, has required, that in certain cases, two-thirds of those present shall be required.

The article of the Constitution, on which the gentleman relies, is, that "Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments." When two-thirds shall deem it necessary. The sense then in this case is to be determined by the exposition given to the term House. I again ask, have or have not the House met to-day? They have. I ask, are we, so met, the House of Representatives? We undoubtedly are. I ask, whether it is not in order to move to expel a disorderly member, or to adjourn? And I ask if the solemn business on which we are now acting shall be defeated by a mere play upon words, that would much better fit a subordinate court than this body? Believing that no doubt can be entertained of the just meaning of this article of the Constitution, either by the House or by the nation, I hope the Committee of the Whole will not be discharged.

Mr. LOWNDES.—I agree with the gentleman from Virginia that we are a House. The Constitution says, that a majority shall constitute a quorum, for the performance of ordinary business. But it appears to me very doubtful whether less than two-thirds of the whole members of each House can pass an amendment to the Constitution. It is possible that the practice of the House heretofore may settle the point. I hope therefore the House will refer it to a select committee, to obtain its investigation. Until I took my seat I was not aware of the objection; but, since I have considered the subject, it does appear to me that two-thirds of the whole members are necessary in this case. I will assign my reasons for this opinion. The framers of the Constitution, I have no doubt, intended to oppose difficulties to the alteration of it, and therefore required the previous concurrence of two-thirds of the whole members of each House, and three-fourths of the Legislatures of the respective States. And they did this very wisely. Without the existence of such obstacles to a change, not a session of Congress would pass away, without materially altering the national compact. If this construction be adopted, the result will be certain, and it will be in the power of every man to ascertain it. If it is not, the result will be perfectly uncertain. For even less than a majority of the whole body may, in such case, propose amendments. A majority of 34 is 18. Eighteen, therefore, is a majority of the Senate to do ordinary business. Two-thirds of eighteen are twelve, which is less than a majority of all the members of the Senate. If, then, the doctrine of the gentleman from Virginia prevail, less than a majority of all the members of the Senate and House of Representatives may propose amendments. This is not, in my opinion, the spirit of the Constitution. For these reasons I am in favor of the motion, with a view that the subject may be referred to a select committee.

Mr. EUSTIS.—If the construction of the gentleman from Connecticut be correct, I will ask how it can be reconciled with the practice under the Constitution, in the case of bills on which the President has put his veto. In the 7th section of first article it is provided that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law." I will ask, if, according to the construction of the gentleman from Connecticut, it will be in the power of the two Houses, in any case, to pass a bill, having thus received the President's veto, unless they consist of the full number of members, which I believe will never be the case. It appears to me that a bill under such circumstances can never pass. But this doctrine does not rest here. For, by the Constitution, amendments shall be proposed whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary. Now, if this doctrine applies to this Legislature, that it must be full, it appears to me that the same requisition will apply to the Legislatures who are finally to adopt the amendments proposed by Congress. Has it ever been known that either this Legislature, or the Legislatures of the States, were completely full? Consequently the doctrine renders it impossible for any amendment ever to be carried.

Mr. THOMAS rose to state, from the Journals of the Senate, in what light they contemplated the doctrine advanced by the gentleman from Connecticut. By the Journal of their proceedings in the year 1789, it appears that on amendments, made by the House of Representatives, a concurrence was voted, though there were only sixteen members out of twenty-six present. There did not appear to be any division on the passage of the amendments; but the entry was in this form:

"IN SENATE, Sept. 9, 1789.

"Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the resolve of the House of Representatives, on 'Articles to be proposed to the Legislatures of the States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States,' with the amendments, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein."

House. I believe that the general rule prescribed is, that a majority of the House is capable of doing business. What business? All that is not specially excepted. I believe also that it is a sound principle that, whenever there is an exception to a general rule, it shall be construed strictly, and not be suffered to contravene the general rule but in the case of the exception. By Congress, then, is meant the two Houses in their organized forms, in which forms they are fully competent to all business, except in cases where more than a majority is required. To this there are two exceptions, viz: in the case of treaties, and the election of a President, wherein a quorum is made to consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States. There is also another exception in the case of impeachments. What is the reason, if it is the intention of the Constitution that in proposing amendments there should be two-thirds of the whole number of Senators elected present, it has not told us so, as explicitly as in the case of impeachment, in the case of treaties, and the election of a President, it has provided the rule? Gentlemen should likewise reflect how far this doctrine carries them. They ought to consider that it is possible that, under their construction, no amendment made to the Constitution is valid. If some are, it is pretty certain that others are not.

MR. THATCHER.—I have examined the Constitution as carefully as time will permit, in every instance in which the Senate is mentioned as a House. The Senate is defined as "composed of two Senators from each State." In this article there is a complete definition of the Senate. But there are two instances in which the members present are particularly designated. The first is in the last part of the third section, in cases of impeachment: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." "No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." The other instance is in the second section of the second article: "The President shall have power, by 'and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." In these two instances the only allusion is to the members present. The other instances in which the Senate is mentioned as a House are three. The first is in the case of the expulsion of a member: "Each House may, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." Another instance is that in which the President puts his veto upon a bill. This part of the Constitution has been already read, and I need not repeat it. The last is the one under consideration: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments." I believe that, in this clause, it is intended by the Constitution that two-thirds of the Senate, composed of two members from each State, should concur; that is, two-thirds of the whole body.

The idea of the gentleman from South Carolina (MR. LOWNDES) has struck me very forcibly. He says that, under the construction attempted to be put on the Constitution, twelve members of the Senate will be sufficient to propose amendments. The same doctrine will apply to this House, where forty-eight members may propose amendments, although seventy-two are required to make a common quorum. Gentlemen will see at once that this could not have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution. But my colleague (MR. EUSTIS) says that, if our construction prevail, whereby the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole of the members of each House is required, the same construction will extend to the State Legislatures. But the article in the Constitution does not warrant this conclusion. Its language is, that amendments shall be valid "when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States." There is no idea expressed that the concurrence of two-thirds of the Legislatures shall be necessary. Hence, I see no weight in this remark.

MR. EUSTIS explained. He had no idea that two-thirds of the State Legislatures were required; but he had said that the House might, with the same propriety, require the sanction of two-thirds of all the members of the State Legislatures as of the other branch of Congress.

MR. THATCHER proceeded. The gentleman from New York (MR. THOMAS) is equally unfortunate. By recurring to the Journals of the Senate for the year 1789, it will be found that several States were not then in the Confederacy. Rhode Island, North Carolina, and Vermont, were not then in the Union.

MR. THOMAS explained. He said he had referred to the Journals of the Senate to show that, by declaring amendments carried by two-thirds of the members present, they had considered two-thirds of the members present a Constitutional majority.

MR. THATCHER.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania has cautioned us against going too far. Caution, I would myself advocate. He says the amendments heretofore adopted are not valid, in case our construction be just, inasmuch as they were passed by less than two-thirds of the whole members of each branch. But he has shown no precedent. Such precedent it is incumbent on gentlemen to advance. There is none within my knowledge.

MR. J. RANDOLPH.—I rise to adduce the precedents the gentleman calls for. They will be found in the Journal of the House of Representatives, under the date of August 21, 1789. Congress then consisted of the thirteen original States, excepting Rhode Island and North Carolina. It will be found that the whole number of members of the House of Representatives at that time was fifty-nine. Of those fifty-nine, forty composed two-thirds. By turning to the Journal the gentleman will perceive that some of the most important amendments that now form a part of the Constitution were passed, not by forty members, but by two-thirds of the members present. Among these amendments are the following:

"Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed."

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

"The freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to apply to the Government for the redress of grievances shall not be infringed."

"A well-regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, being the best security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed; but no one religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service in person."

"No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial; to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

These are by far the greater number of amendments that now exist, and which, according to the doctrines of gentlemen, compose no part of the Constitution, and ought to be expunged from our records. I hope the House is not disposed to countenance such a doctrine.

MR. G. W. CAMPBELL.—I do not rise to inquire into the intrinsic merits of the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Connecticut, but to demand by what authority we make the inquiry into the vote given by the Senate on this occasion. We have received a resolution from the Senate in a regular way, by which it appears to have been passed by a Constitutional majority. I am at a loss to know how the gentleman can ascertain that it is not passed by a Constitutional majority. I believe each House is a judge of its own proceedings; and I believe that, when a resolution or bill comes to this House under the usual forms, we are bound to consider it as passed conformably to the Constitution.

MR. C. said he believed, by an examination of the Constitution, it would be found that the word Senate was used barely to designate the number of members to which each State was entitled; and that when they came to do business they were called House. In the fifth section, the term House is used in three places. In the first, it is stated that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Here the word House must mean a quorum.—"Each House shall keep a Journal," &c. The meaning, here, likewise, of House must be a quorum. There is another instance not noticed by gentlemen—"Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days," &c. I will ask if the sole question is the definition of the word House, whether this single paragraph will not clearly establish it? Can it be said with any degree of plausibility, that in this instance, the word House means anything more than a quorum? Certainly the word in the fifth section means the same thing, unless there is some restrictive language attached to it, which is not to be found. I believe also that the construction proper to be given on this, as well as on other occasions, ought to comport with the practical sense of mankind.

MR. DANA.—The gentlemen asks by what authority we examine the manner in which this resolution has passed the Senate. I will endeavor to answer the inquiry. The Constitution says each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings. The Senate keeps a journal, which is public, and from that we are enabled to ascertain the fact how it passed. This is a sufficient authority to inquire. The question, I apprehend, to be decided is, whether two-thirds of a House can be less than a majority? Frequent reference has been had to the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution; "A majority of each House shall be a quorum to do business." What then is the majority? A majority of the whole. When the Constitution in another place requires two-thirds, will it be said that two-thirds is less than a majority? In examining the Constitution it will be found that it is not the ordinary business of Congress to amend the Constitution; it is not a usual Legislative power; it is an unusual power for those with limited authority to change or extend or limit their own power. In doing this, then, Congress does not act in their Legislative capacity. In all instances in which they do act in such capacity, their acts must be submitted to the President for his approbation. Whereas in proposing an amendment to the Constitution this is not necessary. Why? Because the measure does not partake of Legislative character; it is in virtue of a special grant of power. As then in this case there is a complete deviation from the ordinary authority of Congress, as there is a deviation from the principle of the Constitution which confers limited powers, as there is a deviation from the general principle of agency, it ought not to authorize a change but on the agreement of a majority of the whole members composing the confederacy. To the gentleman from Massachusetts (MR. EVERTS) I answer that there is no precedent of a bill passed, returned by the President with his veto. The question is the same in that case as in this. There is no precedent for either; that it is undecided; and to settle one case which is undecided, reference is had by gentlemen to a case equally disputed. These are the principal ideas which have occurred to me, in addition to those suggested by others, and which I forbear to repeat.

MR. THATCHER said that in the cases alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia (MR. RANDOLPH) the yeas and nays were not taken; it, therefore, did not appear what the majority was. He admitted, that from the language of the Journal, the Clerk of the House entertained the idea that the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present was sufficient; but such an opinion was not binding upon them.

Mr. RODNEY.—Notwithstanding the respect I entertain for the opinion of the gentlemen who support this construction of the Constitution, it seems to me to be utterly without foundation. The ideas of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAMPBELL) are, I think, conclusive. That gentleman asks by what authority we inquire into the proceedings of the Senate, of which they are exclusively the Constitutional judges? It is replied that they are obliged to keep a public journal and that it appears therefrom that this amendment has not received the votes of a Constitutional majority. Is this a fair answer? By the Constitution each House may determine the rules of its own proceeding. If the Senate then have a right to decide on their own rules, they are the only competent judges whether the amendment has been approved by the number which the Constitution requires. On what foundation is this objection taken? Do we know the proceedings of the Senate but through the medium which the Constitution has provided? We have received then this amendment to the Constitution through their legitimate organ, the Clerk. He has in due form notified us of its passage. And to-day we are told, on the evidence of his certificate, that the Senate has not passed it at all, or what is the same thing, that they have not passed it by a Constitutional majority. Now, are we to believe the information we have received from the Senate in the regular and established way, or are we to take their proceedings on a certificate given to a member of this House? Are we to take this information from them, or are we to send a committee to watch their proceedings, and are they to send a committee to watch ours? Surely there is a respect due to the Senate when they transmit to us a resolution declared to be adopted by them, by which we are bound to give credit to it. If this is not the case, all intercourse between the two Houses must be stopped. For if the Senate are to watch us, to determine by what majority and in what manner our acts are passed, and we do the same in relation to their proceedings, we may consume the whole time of the session in discussing these previous questions, without reaching the merits of the measures proposed. These ideas appear to me conclusive. The Constitution is predicated on the existence of a principle of moral integrity in the two Houses, and without such confidence in them, it cannot exist for a day.

But taking the fact, as the gentleman from Connecticut has stated it, I think this resolution has passed the Senate by a Constitutional majority. The gentleman contends that it has not, because it has not received the assent of two-thirds of all the Senators elected; he says that when the Constitution requires the assent of two-thirds only of the members present, we always find it expressly so stated, whereas when it requires two-thirds of either House, it merely calls for two-thirds of the members; and he contends that there is here a wide distinction and essential difference in the meaning. But all this arises from a mere play upon the term House. That term, according to the gentleman, is of wonderful import! He has now discovered that at the first organization of the Government, when every sentiment that gave it birth was fresh on the recollection, when we find among others two venerable members from the State of Delaware, members of the Senate and likewise members of the Federal Convention, giving their assent to amendments to the Constitution, all these proceedings were unconstitutional. How was the assent of the two Houses to these amendments given? Was it by two-thirds of all the members of each House? The Journal proves the reverse to have been the fact. It expressly says they were adopted by two thirds of the Senators present concurring. It is said, however, that this is only the record of the Clerk, and that it shows no more than his opinion. But this is not so. For it is the practice of each House, on the next day, to read the Journal of the proceedings of the antecedent day, and if there be errors to correct them. Now, if we look to this record, at a period immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, we shall find that in September, 1789, it is declared on the Journal of the Senate that amendments passed, and which are now part of the Constitution, were ratified by two-thirds of the members present.

I have ever understood it to be a sound rule of construction, because a sound rule of reason, that a construction of an instrument once received shall not be changed, even if the construction be not so proper as might be given. As then it appears that such was the construction given to the Constitution by many of the members whose labors contributed to its formation, and who may, therefore, be considered as the most perfect masters of its true meaning, shall we at this distant day undertake to give a different construction? Shall we say that we are wiser than all who have gone before us, and expunge from the Constitution those amendments, which have been proposed by two-thirds of the members present of each House, and have been afterwards ratified by three-fourths of the States?

I believe this construction to be the true one. In the Constitution the term House means merely a majority of all the members; and an examination of that instrument will show them that House and Quorum are convertible terms. "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." According to the distinction of gentlemen a majority shall be a quorum. Thus a majority, being assembled, may proceed to business. Now let us see how we are to separate. We must, according to the arguments of gentlemen, work night and day until we get the whole members present. We have, therefore, been transgressing the Constitution every day we have met. We have made rules, by a great quorum, it is true, but every member was not present; and if every member were not present it was not a House, and therefore we had no right to form rules! And yet every gentleman knows that some rules are indispensably necessary. "The yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal." Therefore, we cannot have the yeas and nays entered unless every member be present! "Neither House shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days." In every clause of this particular section the term House is made use of. The House is to determine its rules, and to keep a journal. Gentlemen then must admit, if they are right in their construction, that, without the presence of every member there can be no rules and no journal, and that though we are obliged to keep working without rule or record, yet we cannot adjourn. Is this, Mr. Speaker possible? Do gentlemen seriously contend for such an absurdity?

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Gentlemen have referred to a section of the Constitution where two-thirds of the members present are required, and to other sections where a different language is used; and have thence inferred that a different meaning was intended. But I believe we may use different terms and yet mean the same thing. In the case of treaties and impeachments different language is used to convey the same meaning. If then in these cases different language is used to mean the same thing, will not the like liberty be allowed in other cases? I do not know that the framers of an instrument are bound to use on all occasions the same words to convey the same idea, more than the members of this House are.

Mr. DENNIS.—This, sir, is a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the resolution of the Senate, on the ground that that resolution comes to this House unsupported by such a Constitutional majority, of two-thirds of that body, as is requisite to amend the Constitution. It therefore becomes necessary incidentally to discuss the point, whether a majority of two-thirds of the attending members, or of the whole number of Senators, be necessary, to give validity to the proposed amendment; for if this resolution is not supported by the Constitutional majority, it is a nullity in itself, and the sooner we are discharged from it the better.

But here we are met in the outset by an objection from the gentleman from Delaware, which ties up our hands and precludes us from this investigation. I incline to think that gentleman hazarded the position without that deliberation and caution to which he is accustomed; for his argument would go to the extent, that if this resolution had passed by a bare majority of the Senate and was reported by their Secretary as passed by the Constitutional majority, it would be so conclusive upon us, that we should not have a right to assert the negative. Whatever is done by the competent authority, ought to be presumed to be rightfully done, but this presumption ceases when the negative appears. According to our construction of the Constitution, the negative does expressly appear, for we know the resolution was passed by a less number than a majority of two-thirds of the members of that body. Notwithstanding the objections made to the evidence, independently of the personal knowledge of the members of this House, we have a transcript from the Journal of the Senate, under the official signature of their Secretary, which I had thought was as good evidence as could reasonably be required.

In relation to the Constitutional question, perhaps little can be added to the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD,) because I think the passages cited from the Constitution by that gentleman, and the deductions drawn from those passages, demonstrate the proposition which he contends for; which is, not that every member of the Legislature should be present, as some gentlemen suppose, but that there shall be a sufficient number present, voting in the affirmative, to amount to a majority of two-thirds of all the members. If we look into the Constitution we shall find in the first section, it declares all Legislative power shall be vested in a Congress, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives. It then says, "that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the members of the several States," &c. In the third section it says, "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State," &c. And in the clause respecting amendments, it says, "the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution," &c. It then results from these provisions that unless the House of Representatives or Senate, taken distinctly, are bodies composed of less than all their parts and members; and that Congress, which is composed of a junction of the two, may be composed of a less number than all the members of each House, that this resolution which is passed only by a majority of two-thirds of the attending members, and not of all its members, is not passed in conformity with the amendatory clause of the Constitution.

But we are told that if this be the construction of the Constitution, we are violating that instrument every day, in passing laws by a majority of the attending members. But, sir, the gentlemen ought to remember that this is in consequence of a positive grant in another part of the Constitution, which says that "a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business." What business? Their ordinary legislative business, where a simple majority is only necessary to effect it. But surely no man can suppose that the clause last cited is to be applied to any case except to the legislative power which that clause proceeds; or can torture it to have an application to a provision in the latter part of the instrument, wholly unconnected with it, and where two-thirds are necessary to give validity to an act. For if any doubt could exist on that subject, it will be removed by advert- ing to the clause respecting the treaty-making power and the power of impeachment; where two-thirds must concur, and where it is confined to two-thirds of the members present. The using of the word present in these clauses proves, that the Convention conceived that unless in these cases they had expressly confined it to the attending members, two-thirds of the whole number would be requisite to a decision; and it also proves, that having omitted the word present in the important article of amendment, they did not mean, in that case, that less than a majority of two-thirds of the whole should be competent to act. To my mind it is impossible that a stronger implication can arise, than what results from these clauses, to prove that wherever they spoke of a majority of two-thirds as being necessary to act, they meant what every person must conclude, that it must be a majority of two-thirds of the whole, unless where they expressed themselves to the contrary. Nor is this construction at all affected by any of the precedents cited; for all of them relate to acts of ordinary legislation, except the case cited by a gentleman from New York (Mr. THOMAS,) and another by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH.) The first proves nothing; because it appears that there were sixteen members present and no division on the question, and the whole of them may have voted in the affirmative; and as North Carolina and Rhode Island had not come into the Union at the time, the whole number of Senators was but twenty-two—so that sixteen was a majority of two-thirds of the whole. The same answer may be given to the other; for at that time this House consisted of fifty-nine members, and forty-nine members were present and voted on the question, upon which no yeas and nays were taken, and all of whom, from aught that appears to the contrary, may have voted for it. From this view of the subject, therefore, I conceive the resolution before us has not received the support of a sufficient number of the Senators, and I shall vote to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. J. CLAY.—The gentleman last up from Maryland, and the gentleman from Connecticut, have undertaken to draw a distinction between ordinary Legislative business and other business confided to Congress. In the third section of the Constitution, the power to try impeachments is given to the Senate and to the Senate alone. If the construction of the gentleman obtain, it is given only to the whole body, as this power is not conferred upon them in their ordinary Legislative capacity: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try impeachments; when sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside, and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members." There are a great number of formalities which show the intention of the Constitution to draw a distinction between this power and the powers of ordinary legislation. The section concludes by saying that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Now, if the word Senate did not in all cases mean the members present, these powers will be exercised in direct contravention of the Constitution.
